That interpreter said (and if he did not say it there was a Republican there who understood Spanish who did say it), "There is a new party in power which has not had possession of this Government since you came into the Union, or since the civil war, and since you were free; that new party has been doing things to sheep and to wool by taking the tariff off; and if you do not understand what that means, it means that they have reduced the price in order that New Mexico shall clothe the people of this country with their wool and feed them with their sheep, to their own poverty and detriment."

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Does the Senator know that in 1893 there had been no repeal of the tariff or any tariff taken off by the Democratic party?

Mr. DEPEW. On wool?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. On anything.

Mr. DEPEW. In 1894.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. It was not until 1894, and the 28th of August at that.

Mr. LODGE. The threat was enough.

Mr. DEPEW. I may have got my date a little wrong, but the effect on wool and on sheep nobody denies. Cattle came in from Mexico and nearly ruined the cattle-producing countries of the West. The New Mexican farmer will go home after that meeting, having been down to Santa Fe or to Albuquerque, and having sold his sheep for four or five dollars, and having sold his wool anywhere from 20 to 30 cents, and he will hand the money over to the good woman—for the Mexican knows nothing about banks, and buries his money until it is needed—and she will say, "Alfonzo," or whatever may be his Spanish name, "they are going to fool you about speeches made in the United States Senate in order to get you again to give away your sheep and give away your wool, but, Alfonzo, stand by your family and your home;" and the Mexican will.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very glad to hear this exposition on the part of the distinguished Senator from New York. A dispatch was sent to the Boston Journal early in the recent campaign saying that I had broken with the Administration on this question and was going back on the Republican party for the reason that all these Territories, if admitted as States, would send Democratic Senators to this body. In an interview in a New Hampshire paper I controverted that statement as best I could, and I am delighted to be reinforced in my view by the Senator from New York in his argument that New Mexico will be a Republican State, notwithstanding his speech. I am very glad to know that fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was just going to ask the Senator from New York, if his speech was a joke, why he did not put in it that the Democrats would carry that State. The Senator now acknowledges that it is going to be represented by two Mexicans who will have no more sense than to remain Republicans the balance of their lives.

Mr. DEPEW. If what has been said by our Democratic friends is correct as to the growth of this State, the Mexicans can not save it. They say that populations are going in there from Texas, from Arkansas, and from Missouri, under this irrigation which is to make New Mexico as solidly Democratic, despite these Mexicans, as Arkansas, or Missouri, or Texas themselves.

Here is a joint resolution passed by the present legislature of New Mexico:

Resolved, That there shall be printed in the Spanish language such bills, rules, reports, and documents, and all other matter as may be ordered by either house of the thirty-fifth legislative assembly.

We all know what are the habits of Latin peoples. We know that until they get mixed with Americans and adopt American habits and get American ideas those conditions never change.

In view of the fact that Latin people with Latin ideas will probably control in the future as it does now the legislation of New Mexico, here is a bill which has just been introduced.

House bill No. 42. Introduced by Hon. Antonio D. Vargas, January 29, 1903. Read first and second time by title, ordered translated and printed, and referred to committee on judiciary.

An act relative to the Sunday law.

Be it enacted by the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico:

SECTION 1. That hereafter no saloon keeper, bartender, nor merchant of any kind or description shall be compelled to close his place of business on the first day of the week, called Sunday.

SEC. 2. That hereafter no fine shall be imposed upon any bartender, saloon keeper, or any merchant of any kind or description for selling liquors or any kind of goods or articles of any description on Sunday.

SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act shall be repealed, and this act shall be in full force and take effect thirty days after the passage of the same.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is that a bill or a law?

Mr. DEPEW. It is a bill which has been introduced and moved upon its bounding passage through the legislature.

Mr. TILLMAN. Something like our trust legislation from the other end of the Capitol?

Mr. DEPEW. The difference is that the trust legislation from the other end of the Capitol, having passed the popular branch, is not likely to be amended in the upper House.

We now come naturally to the wonderful results that are to be derived from irrigation. The amount of misinformation and ignorance that there is on the subject of irrigation in the Senate would fill a volume; it would fill a library. I voted for the irrigation bill. When my friends from these alkali and cactus States and Territories appealed to me as to what would be done by storing water and letting the little rivulets flow, it occurred to me that $100,000,000, more or less, was nothing if that result would be attained. So I enthusiastically supported the bill for irrigation.

Now, my amazement is the testimony which has been delivered here on that behalf before this committee. Speaking of testimony, as my friend, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], is here, I want to say that in the discussion, when the able speech of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM] was being delivered, he showed that the testimony of one Martinez Amador, a Mexican, had been voluntarily given and that the testimony of Martinez Amador was to the effect, first, that the Mexican population did not know what statehood was, and, next, if they did know they would be against it. My friend, the Senator from North Dakota, sent up and had read by the Secretary a letter in which the value of the testimony of Martinez Amador was impeached. Attached to it there is no affidavit. In this letter the writer says:

Now, Martinez Amador is one of our old cranks here to whom no one pays any attention. I have heard him called the "Las Cruces anarchist" and also "the town fool."

Then, in the peculiar contradiction which characterizes everything that comes from the statehood side, the writer of this letter goes on to show that this crank, this anarchist, this town fool is the only rich man there is in the place, and that he made his own money. [Laughter.]

Now, coming——

Mr. TILLMAN. Before the Senator leaves that point, will he enlighten us as to whether he inherited his wealth.

Mr. DEPEW. He earned it himself. He started as a freighter. He is the only American Mexican there.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The letter does not call attention to the fact that the objection of Mr. Amador to statehood was on account of the fact that he did not want his wealth taxed as it would be taxed under statehood.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, I was only calling attention to the fact, no matter what may be the motive which this man had to oppose statehood, that in New Mexico a man who commences life as a freighter and then gets a farm, and then gets a ranch, and then gets so rich, as this letter says this man has, that he lives upon his income without labor, is in New Mexico regarded by advocates of statehood as a crank, an anarchist, a town fool.

Every American certainly wants this great desert to blossom as the rose. It is no pleasure for any Senator to stand here and describe the conditions which exist in this Territory. It is no pleasure for any Senator to produce the testimony which shows that the hopes which were held about irrigation will never be realized. Everybody here would be delighted beyond language if they could be. The Fourth of July oration which the Senator from Nevada has said I ought to make, I would make with all the power I possess if the expenditure of $100,000,000 or $500,000,000 would irrigate these arid plains and enable large populations to live there; would produce homes, villages, cities, industries, and add to the wealth and glory of our country. But I pause on the threshold of the introduction of a new State into the Union when the argument for that State is that its growth is to come from irrigation, when an examination shows that irrigation has about reached its limits.

New Mexico can be irrigated only by the Rio Grande and Pecos rivers. The testimony shows that these rivers have reached their full flood, and that the rivers in Arizona in many cases have fallen off.

There is the testimony taken at Phoenix, where the land irrigated is less to-day than it was forty years ago. There is the testimony that the Salt River of Arizona, upon which a large portion of that Territory depended for irrigation, has diminished in volume 70 per cent in the last five years. We also know that as population increases in Colorado and at the headwaters of the rivers upon which everything depends they are absorbing more and more water every year, and that the Rio Grande, which two hundred years ago had water its whole length, now two-thirds of the year and for two-thirds of its distance is absolutely dry. There are Mexican traditions that two hundred years ago——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senator is referring to what is known as the Rio Grande River in that country and not the Colorado.

Mr. DEPEW. Yes; the Rio Grande and the Pecos.

Mr. TELLER. We call the Colorado the river running into the Gulf of California. You are speaking of the one that runs down through New Mexico.

Mr. DEPEW. Yes; through New Mexico. That is the Rio Grande, is it not?

Now, there is the testimony which shows that something over two hundred years ago there was a population of 400,000 people in New Mexico. Why is it that those 400,000 people in two hundred years have gotten down to less than 200,000? It is because the streams dry up or are dried up by artificial processes.

After forty years of irrigation in Arizona, with all the capital that has gone out there from New York and through Eastern cities, with all the effort made to develop that agriculture by irrigation, and with the land free for anybody, of the 73,000,000 acres there are only 186,000, in round numbers, which are irrigated. One-fourth of 1 per cent of the whole area of that vast Territory, after forty years of exploitation, is all that they have irrigated.

When you come to New Mexico, out of 78,000,000 acres there are only 205,000 irrigated. In other words, there only one-fourth of 1 per cent has been irrigated.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. I think it is due to the Senate that the facts as to the figures given by the Senator from New York should be made known.

Mr. DEPEW. I will state that I got the figures from the testimony taken by the committee.

Mr. PATTERSON. The only witness upon that subject was Mr. Newell, connected with the Department here at Washington. While he was giving his testimony, before he concluded, I requested the committee to permit the Delegate from the Territory of New Mexico to be present, that he——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I hope the Senator will allow me. I think the Senator will thank me for interrupting him as to what may have occurred in the committee room. I think that perhaps we have had two or three discussions here about that. Of course I have no objection to the Senator going on, if, after I call his attention, he wishes to do so.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, when a Territory such as New Mexico and Arizona are having their natural resources discredited, when the property and the interests of every citizen of such a Territory are being depreciated and their status in the industrial and commercial world is being assailed, I think it is common justice that the character of the testimony that is the basis of an attack of that character should accompany the assault. It is for that reason that I say the entire testimony is the testimony of one man, and the committee who had this investigation in charge brought that testimony in at the very close of the examination and gave to the other side no opportunity to combat it or to rebut it——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. PATTERSON. And refused the common courtesy of having the Delegate from that Territory appear in the committee room to cross-examine the witness who was produced. I think it is but common justice to these two Territories that are thus assaulted to let these facts go with their defamation.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I am surprised at the remarks of the Senator from Colorado. The committee called Professor Newell to testify in respect to the matter after they met here, and we were required to make a report by a given day. The suggestion was made that the Delegate from that Territory be brought here to examine Professor Newell. Attention was called to the fact that we were obliged instantly to report the bill back, and there was not the time, and the Senator from Colorado knows that he acquiesced in that——

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. And the rest of the committee know it.

Mr. PATTERSON. It simply establishes the proposition that that witness was the last witness who was called, and that the representatives of the Territories assailed have had no opportunity to meet what I do not hesitate to say is a slander on the Territories, and that I withdrew my objection only when the chairman of the committee and other members of the committee opposed to the admission of these Territories made it perfectly plain that they would not permit the delegates to be called for the purpose of protecting the Territories they represented.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, if the Senator from New York has concluded his remarks, and no other Senator is ready to take the floor, I should be glad to have a vote on this bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from New York has not concluded his remarks. He yielded the floor, as the Senator knows, for a moment.

Mr. QUAY. I did not know it. I only knew the Senator from New York had disappeared from the floor.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from New York has not disappeared from the floor.

Mr. QUAY. I did not see the Senator here.

Mr. DEPEW. I will say to my friend from Pennsylvania that I was simply gathering more ammunition. [Laughter.]

Mr. QUAY. Very well; I hope the Senator from New York will proceed; and I trust that his next fire will be more effective than the last. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from New York to yield to me for a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] made a reflection upon a very credible witness before the Committee on Territories, which I am sure the Senator would not have made if he had given a close examination to the record and reflection to the real import of what was said.

As to Professor Newell being the last witness, that circumstance, of course, is not a matter of weight. There had to be a last witness as well as there had to be a first witness. So the very fact that he was the last witness adds no significance to anything the Senator might say, nor does it add to anything that Professor Newell testified to, nor does it detract from it. That circumstance alone, on which the changes were rung by the Senator from Colorado, is not therefore a matter of consequence.

Mr. President, the attack upon the testimony of this witness would no doubt not have been made if the testimony given had suited the views of those Senators who support the bill now before the Senate. That testimony was given by a scientific man, Mr. President; a man whose integrity has never been questioned; a man whose high and unusual competency is universally admitted—the hydrographer of the United States Geological Survey; the author of valuable and authoritative books upon irrigation and kindred subjects, perhaps the best informed man in this country upon these great natural questions and the modification of those conditions which irrigation will bring in the future. Professor Newell could not testify anything but as to the scientific facts.

Not only that, Mr. President, but it was not an ex parte examination. It was before a full committee; it was not even before a subcommittee. The Senator from Colorado, himself a lawyer whose skill we all admit, and especially with whose skill as a cross-examiner all lawyers in the country are familiar, was present, and did the chief part, almost the sole part, of the cross-examination of Professor Newell. I would invite the attention of every Senator upon this floor, no matter what side of this question he may have taken, to read that testimony and see whether or not in one single circumstance Professor Newell was shaken by the careful and skillful cross-examination of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. President, I submit that when a man of science, having no interest one way or the other, testifies under oath to questions put to him directly as to what information he has upon the subject as to scientific conclusions, and even after he has been subjected to the cross-examination of an earnest, learned, and skillful lawyer, it is hardly fair or hardly according to the proportions of what should be debate in this Senate, for that testimony to be assailed simply because Delegates, who are not members of the Senate, were not permitted to come in and cross-examine him.

The Senator had abundant opportunity to consult with those Delegates, to lay the testimony of this witness before them, and he has had the opportunity since, and from the information thus acquired, just as he would do in the case of his clients in court, to examine the witness anew. That right was not denied him, Mr. President, and the Senator himself saw the justice of that, because he did not press his motion, but after some little discussion—which all appears, I see, in the record—participated in chiefly by the Senator from Colorado himself and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the Senator from Colorado said, "I will not press the motion."

So the validity of this testimony can not be impeached because two Delegates were not present. Could they have done better cross-examination than the Senator from Colorado, if they had been present? Are they better lawyers? Are they more familiar in general with the subject of irrigation?

Now, what particular point of this testimony was it, Mr. President, that brought out the remarks of my honorable friend, the Senator from Colorado? It was the testimony of Professor Newell as to the proportions of cultivated lands in New Mexico and Arizona. All the testimony in the world could not change the figures in the possession of Professor Newell. So upon that point, to which the Senator addresses his observation, it would have been perfectly useless for him or for anybody else to have cross-examined, because there were the figures.

As I said, Mr. President, if the Senator had not thought that Professor Newell was stating the truth, was stating scientific facts, he had an opportunity not only to consult the Delegates from the Territories, showing them what testimony had been given—and that is the only thing that a lawyer has when dealing with his client—but he had the opportunity to consult with other scientific men; he had the opportunity, if necessary, to consult with Professor Newell himself—there could have been no objection to that—and thus reinformed as to any inaccuracy that Professor Newell may have committed in his statement, the Senator could have returned anew to take up the cross-examination.

I say this much, Mr. President, to show that I think the Senator's statement is hardly justified, that the testimony of Professor Newell—which I repeat I wish every Senator might read; it is so impartial, and it is the statement of a matter of science—that it is hardly fair for the Senator to attempt to impeach or to impugn that testimony as to either its accuracy or its completeness.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, this line of attack upon New Mexico and Arizona is a grave wrong to every resident of those two Territories. It is an assault upon every dollar of capital that is invested in them. It is the most serious drawback that could be conceived of to the future advancement of the country involved. Usually, Mr. President, members of the Senate and others delight in picturing the glories, the grandeur, the greatness, and the prosperity of the country, but for some reason Senators who are opposed to the admission of these Territories as States, see nothing in them but evil, and have nothing but wrong in them to proclaim.

So far as this particular feature of this controversy is concerned, everything that each of the opponents of these two Territories proclaims proves the truth of what I have said. Professor Newell was the last witness called, and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] stated that the reason the Delegates from the Territories were not permitted to be present either to examine or to cross-examine him was that the report had to be made almost immediately, and the committee had not time to spare for such a purpose. Now, the Senator from Indiana turns around and suggests that I had ample opportunity to call other expert witnesses or to have conversed with Professor Newell or to have brought in testimony of whatever sort I could find for the purpose of overcoming, if that were possible, the statements that were made by Professor Newell.

The suggestions of the two Senators do not coincide. One could not grant any time, so he said, as to the committee, because the report had to be made immediately; and the other suggests that there was ample time and that I did not take the opportunity that was presented.

Mr. President, whatever sincerity there may be in the compliments the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] saw fit to pay me as a lawyer and cross-examiner, I might ask him this question: Of what avail is skill as a cross-examiner if the attorney has no knowledge of the case with which he is connected? What did I know about the details of New Mexico's topography or its climatic conditions, or the number or the nature or the character of its streams? Only that which any person could obtain by the study of geography or by general reading. That does not qualify either a Senator or an attorney to properly cross-examine a witness whose testimony is scientific, as the Senator from Indiana suggests, and whose testimony is entitled to particular regard because it is the evidence of a scientist.

I say, Mr. President, that it would have been but a meager concession when these Senators knew as well as they knew that they were living, in view of the use that they knew they intended to make of the testimony of Professor Newell, if they had given somebody who had knowledge of the real conditions of that Territory an opportunity to appear in the committee room, and by such pointed questions and such pointed suggestions as knowledge of the real conditions would have permitted to have confounded, if it were possible, the witness that was doing his Territory and his home so grave an injustice.

The Senator from Indiana speaks of Professor Newell as a scientist, and he wants Senators to read his testimony. Mr. President, the experience of the attorney is that the testimony of the scientist in matters of that character as against the testimony of of the every-day man of affairs who lives there and has personal knowledge of the things of which he speaks is not to be compared in conclusiveness and satisfaction with the testimony of the latter. Those of us who have tried mining cases can appreciate this. If the Senator will but read the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States he will find that the greatest legal tribunals in the country have declared that, as against the scientist, the testimony of the man of affairs—the common, practical miner—is infinitely superior, and carries much the greater weight with the court.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I call the Senator's attention to the fact, which no doubt for the moment he has forgotten, that it appears from the testimony of Professor Newell that not only is he a scientist, speaking as such, but as a man personally familiar with the whole subject, having made examination after examination on the ground, so that he combines both the scientist's information with that of the person who is on the ground.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, Mr. President, that is the peculiarity of scientists; they claim to know everything about every subject. A man whose education is in Washington——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Permit me. Does the Senator deny that it appears in the Record itself that Professor Newell testified that he had been over the ground. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that this is not a book scientist, but a man who testified before the committee that he had examined the subject on the ground, and thoroughly.

Mr. PATTERSON. Of course, that is the peculiarity of all such scientists. There is absolutely nothing with which they are not familiar—practically, theoretically, and in every other way. To confess their ignorance of any phase of any subject would, according to their standard of skill, be to write them down, not scientists, but common ordinary people.

But, Mr. President, Professor Newell is the head or is a high official of some Washington bureau. He has gone to this great Territory occasionally, up one stream and down another. To say that he is familiar with one one-thousandth part of the great Territories of Arizona and New Mexico is to declare that the age of miracles is yet with us and that men who seem to be, so far as effort is concerned, confined to the qualities and abilities of a human being, have the qualities and abilities of ethereal beings hovering over an entire Territory and enabled to take with one sweep of the eagle eye everything that is to be seen upon the surface and beneath the surface—wherever the spiritual eye could reach.

In reply to the Senator from Indiana, I simply meant to say, in defense of those two Territories, in defense of the people who live there, whose all is there, who have gone to the West for the purpose of building up great Territories and making them great States, that what is claimed as to the small amount of land that is subject to irrigation is the statement of one who knows substantially nothing whatever of the subject of which he speaks, and, if he does know, then, Mr. President, he is entirely mistaken in the claims that he makes.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] seems to have become oblivious——

Mr. QUAY rose.

Mr. NELSON. I will yield to the Senator from Pennslyvania for a motion to adjourn, and reply to the Senator from Colorado in the morning.

Tuesday, February 17, 1903.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, the debate closed while I had the floor at the last hearing upon the statehood bill with an eloquent speech on the part of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] in reply to what I was saying at the time. He was taking exception to my remarks and giving to them an interpretation and a free expression of his own views. He took the broad ground that the position of the opponents of this omnibus statehood bill amounted, in the first place, to an attack upon the West, the great West; in the second place, that it was a tremendous injury to the investments and the population of these Territories to have the statements made here become a permanent record in regard to their condition with the testimony delivered before the Committee on Territories and the views of scientists upon their condition, and, lastly, he complained that the committee and the speakers had been guided in what had been said by the reports of a scientist when the testimony of practical men would be of more value.

Now, I yield to no one in my respect and admiration for the great West. I do not propose, however, to assent to Territories which are no part of the great West, which have none of the characteristics of that magnificent part of our imperial domain, coming into the Senate under the cloak of those great Commonwealths. The Middle West, formed out of the Territories ceded by Virginia, Maryland, New York, and other States, are to-day not only among the most prosperous of the States of the Union, but they have before them a wonderful future. The States formed out of the Louisiana Purchase, fifteen of them, are to celebrate next year the one hundredth anniversary of the purchase of that territory. Those fifteen States are centers of civilization, of population, and of wealth, which add enormously to the power of the Republic.

The Northwestern States, great and growing, and the State of my friend the Senator from Colorado, great and growing, are all parts of this Great West. This Great West has over 30,000,000 of the 76,000,000 of the people of the United States, and it can not be put in comparison with Arizona and New Mexico. That territory which came from Mexico to us, which is a part of Colorado (the poorest part), New Mexico, Arizona, Nevada, and Utah—that is not the Great West. It was known while the Great West was being built up as the Great American Desert on the maps which we had in the schoolrooms in our boyhood. That territory was settled long before the Great West had a white inhabitant. It was under territorial governments of Mexico two hundred years before the Great West had Territorial governments or populations. While that territory has remained stagnant, the Great West which I have alluded to, the States under the ordinance of 1787, the States of the Louisiana purchase, and the other States of the Northwest, have grown to be nearly one-half in population, in power, and in wealth of the Republic, and are advancing more rapidly than any other part of this great nation.

So I, sharing any enthusiasm which my friend the Senator from Colorado may have, will join in his most glowing periods of the Great West. But I can not stand here and permit him to hide behind this magnificent association of Commonwealths, of areas, of civilization, and of all that makes a great country, these alkali plains and arid wastes and these unpopulated districts, which in three hundred years have stood so far behind the Great West, and call them the Great West and equally deserving statehood.

Mr. President, as to the suppression of the truth or as to misstatements, I have seen no misstatements in regard to the present conditions which prevail in Arizona and New Mexico. They are not the vaporings of the platform; they are not anonymous communications to the press; they are not the mere statements of people which are unverified, but they are the testimony of witnesses on the ground, summoned and appearing and giving their testimony before one of the committees of the Senate.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Under oath.

Mr. DEPEW. And giving that testimony under oath, each witness subject to all that brings out the truth in our courts and tests the veracity and credibility of witnesses by a cross-examination by those who are anxious to let in those Territories as States and who wanted as favorable testimony as possible. There has been no perversion of the truth and there has been no suppression of the truth.

It would be a great misfortune if in adding at this period of our history new Commonwealths to take their equal position through their United States Senators in this Chamber they should come in here under false pretenses, under a suppression of the truth, or under a keeping back of the facts which, if known, would prevent the American people justifying their arriving yet at statehood.

The suppression of the truth, Mr. President, is not in telling the exact facts about these States, and therefore preventing their immediate admission, but it is in admitting them. We all remember the old couplet, so often recited and never controverted:

> Truth crushed to earth shall rise again:
> The eternal years of God are hers;
> But Error, wounded, writhes with pain,
> And dies among its worshippers.

But, for the first time since that couplet was quoted in sermons, in orations, and in schoolbooks, the admission of these Territories, unless the truth were told, would bury truth so that it could never rise again, because if these Territories came in as States without our knowing all about them—no matter if the truth did injure property no matter if it did stop booms, no matter if it did interrupt speculations, no matter if it was hostile to promoters—if they came in because the truth was suppressed, on that account, then, as no State can ever be put out of the Union, truth would be buried under the Dome of this Capitol, and truth could never rise again until in the crack of doom and on the day of judgment there was a dissolution of the Union.

I was very much surprised at the position which my friend, the Senator from Colorado, took at this late day in reference to the superiority of the practical man to the scientist on a question like that of the possibilities of irrigation, of the possibilities of storing water, of the area that could be watered by storage, and of absorption and evaporation.

The old river Nile has flowed from its mythical source—mythical until our generation—for millions of years, making fertile by the overflow of its banks the territory through which it ran. As the headwaters became settled the flow ceased to be as great, and distress came to that country, which, during the whole classic period, was the granary of the world. "The man with the hoe" and the plow, and the men with the boat propelled by oar or sail or rope or pole, the men who traveled up and down, were all intent upon the relief of agriculture along this great river. Twenty odd dynasties came in the ancient period, and were unequal to the task. The highest civilization was succeeded by Mohammedanism, and every stage of the highest civilization of the world during historic and nonhistoric periods has given itself to this problem of the Nile.

The Nile differs from the Rio Grande and the Pecos and the Salt River of our Territories in the fact that it flows all the year round, but at the flood it overflowed its banks and made agriculture possible. It has been reserved for the last decade, for the engineer under the government established there by Great Britain, to solve the problem of old Nile and to harness her to industry. The great dam at Assuan, the most wonderful structure of ancient or modern times, has impounded those waters in such a way that hereafter there will be no more drought in Egypt and no more suffering among the farmers. Instead of relying upon the uncertainties of weather, of sunlight, of drought, and of flood, the river is controlled, and controlled by science.

A scientific gentleman, selected by the United States Government because he is at the head of his profession, is appointed the chief hydrographer of the United States Geological Survey, Prof. F. H. Newell. He has no private purposes to accomplish, he has no political or personal aims in view, but under his oath of office, knowing that this work is to be verified or disputed by all the selfish interests—and properly selfish interests—affected in those vast Territories, he is sent out there by the Government for the purpose of making investigation and report. He visits every part of those Territories with his assistants; he travels up and down those rivers; he goes to the mountains; he looks at the lakes; he estimates the rainfall, and he ascertains the storage capacity of the water there is in all that country.

Now, his conclusions are disputed, because it is said that the practical man knows more on this subject than the scientist possibly can. I will admit that the cowboy knows more about herding his cattle and taking care of them than a professor of the Geological Survey; I will admit that the farmer will know more as to the management of his crops and the miner as to the working of his mines, but it is simply absurd to say that the cowboy or the farmer or the miner or the prospector, in the limited area in which he works, with the limited information that he has on such subjects, can state what is the amount of the flow of the Rio Grande, of the Pecos, and of the Salt River; that he can tell what is the amount of water which is gathered and which may be stored in the mountains and at the sources of these rivers; that he can tell how much acreage of water is necessary for the purpose of irrigating an acre of land. His testimony would be absolutely worthless. But here is an expert of the Government, a distinguished scientist, whose object in testifying is simply to tell the truth.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Before the Senator from New York reads the testimony of Professor Newell, I wish to say that Professor Newell is not only the hydrographer of the United States Geological Survey, and a scientist of great eminence, as the Senator from New York says, but also that he has personally and practically familiar knowledge of the section of country of which he testifies. That appears, as I think the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] will remember, on the face of the testimony itself. So that the testimony of Professor Newell is not only the testimony of a scientist such as the Senator from New York has described, but also the testimony of a practical man, who has examined the situation on the ground. Therefore the value of his scientific testimony is reenforced and emphasized by his practical and personal examination of the subject-matter.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. It is not my purpose to interrupt the Senator from New York at all in his speech to-day, as I understood him to say on yesterday that he was anxious to conclude this afternoon, as he was obliged to leave the city, so I shall not now indulge in any interruption, except to say that if an opportunity is offered, without trenching too much upon the Senator or taking too much of the time of the Senate, I shall be able to demonstrate from official documents in the Department and on the testimony of the Department itself that Professor Newell is sadly mistaken about the capabilities of New Mexico as to the amount of water and everything that pertains to the agricultural possibilities of the Territory.

I think I shall also be able to demonstrate in the most conclusive way that the suggestion of the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] that New Mexico is standing still and is not progressing with the West, that the new life and new blood which is now coursing in this country from one end of it to the other is not flowing into New Mexico—I think I shall be able to demonstrate that the Senator is sadly mistaken in that respect also. But I do not think it would be fair to him, in view of the matter of time, to interrupt him to do so now.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from New York had all day and the Senator from Colorado has plenty of time.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator from Indiana suggests that the Senator from New York has all day and that I have plenty of time. If the Senator from New York will say that, I will give him a few facts and figures now, which I think will change his views upon the subject.

Mr. DEPEW. If the Senator thinks he has any facts which can change my views I want to hear him now.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, that was a sotto voce remark of mine, such as frequently passes between my very good and honorable friend the Senator from Colorado and myself.

Mr. DEPEW. Professor Newell says that it has been his duty to examine from a scientific standpoint the physical conditions of New Mexico and Arizona, and that since 1888 he has spent considerable time in those Territories and in the adjoining States. I read the following from his testimony:

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state to the committee, in your own way, the situation in the Territory of New Mexico with reference to the question of aridity?

Mr. NEWELL. The Territory is well within the arid region, and agriculture there is dependent almost entirely upon the artificial application of water.

The CHAIRMAN. By the artificial application of water you mean irrigation?

Mr. NEWELL. Yes, sir; irrigation. The principal source of supply is the Rio Grande and its largest tributary, the Pecos River. The United States Geological Survey has been measuring the flow of the Rio Grande where it enters New Mexico, and at various points along its course. We have also measured some of its tributaries, and have measured where it leaves the Territory to form the boundary line between Texas and the Republic of Mexico. We have been making studies of the extent to which that water can be used for irrigation purposes in the future.

Now, where is the man of the rule of the thumb, the practical man, who has made investigations of that kind? And where is the man who has made investigations of that kind who had the scientific knowledge to make his investigations of any earthly value?

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state to the committee the extent to which that water is used at present?

Mr. NEWELL. The usual summer supply is entirely employed, and there is now a considerable acreage under cultivation for which there is not a sufficient supply of water in all seasons.

That is now.

The spring flow—the floods—in large part go to waste, and water storage is absolutely essential to the future development of the Territory.

He then goes on to state that there is some water storage, but that it could be greatly improved. Then Senator PATTERSON takes up the cross-examination in regard to this water storage:

Senator PATTERSON. Tremendous volumes of water come down those rivers during certain seasons of the year, do they not?

Mr. NEWELL. They are very large.

Senator PATTERSON. If the waters could be conserved a very heavy percentage of land could be put under irrigation, could it not?

Mr. NEWELL. We have been measuring the amount of water, and if it could all be saved several hundred thousand acres could be irrigated.

"Several hundred thousand acres," and you must remember, Mr. President, that in these two Territories are 151,000,000 acres. This scientist says that if the water which is available is stored, several hundred thousand acres more can be irrigated.

Senator PATTERSON. Is that the limit—several hundred thousand?

Mr. NEWELL. I think so. The limit is the total amount of water which comes down the Rio Grande and Pecos. The measurements at various points on the Rio Grande give the actual amount of water which has passed that point during various years in succession. Those figures I can insert in the testimony if you wish.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I simply want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that Professor Newell was not speaking of the two Territories, but of New Mexico alone. That statement has no relation to Arizona at all.

Mr. DEPEW. But the testimony that is here in regard to Arizona is substantially to the effect that the condition of Arizona is worse than that of New Mexico.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, however that may be, it has no relation to the Pecos River, but only to the Rio Grande. No part of Arizona would be watered by the Rio Grande.

Mr. DEPEW. I understand.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But, Mr. President, Professor Newell does also testify concerning Arizona quite as fully as he does concerning New Mexico.

Mr. DEPEW. Here is what he says:

The CHAIRMAN. You may state to the committee what portions of this Territory may be used—whether there is a possibility of agriculture in this Territory except by irrigation.

Mr. NEWELL. It is not possible excepting on the northern portion of the Territory. There, at an elevation of about 7,000 feet, settlers are raising small areas of potatoes without irrigation, and some cereals, cut green, for feeding cattle.

The CHAIRMAN. Aside from that, the occupation of agriculture is not possible there, except by irrigation from streams. Is that true?

Mr. NEWELL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. In order to make this brief, I will state that the committee understands that the irrigated area is about Phoenix, some on the Gila River, and some near Yuma.

Mr. NEWELL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What can you state about the sufficiency or the insufficiency of the water supply for the irrigation canals about Phoenix?

Phoenix, we must remember, Mr. President, is the most important, as well as the most promising, part of the Territory of Arizona.

Mr. NEWELL. The condition at Phoenix is extremely serious, as the land under cultivation exceeds in area the available supply of water.

Remember, that is now.

For the last two or three years there has not been sufficient water for more than half or two-thirds of the land which has been normally under cultivation.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that because there is not enough water in the river?

Mr. NEWELL. It is because of the shrinkage of the river during the past few years.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any other source of water supply for irrigation, except that water from the river?

Mr. NEWELL. That is the only source excepting a small amount of water to be obtained from deep or artesian wells, and from shallow wells in the gravels near the river channel.

The CHAIRMAN. Could any appreciable quantity of water be obtained in that way, taking into consideration the whole area?

Mr. NEWELL. That would probably not represent more than 1, 2, or 3 per cent of the entire area that is irrigable.

There you have——

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. DEPEW. I will yield in a moment if the Senator will allow me to conclude just one statement.

Mr. PATTERSON. Very well.

Mr. DEPEW. The testimony is here that the rivers about Phoenix, especially the Salt River, have diminished 70 per cent in volume in the last five or six years.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, upon the theory that I will not interfere with the Senator's movements after to-day, I will venture to interrupt him at this time for the purpose of making some suggestions upon the area of irrigable land in New Mexico as we find the subject treated by the Department of the Interior, and especially now with reference to New Mexico. Professor Newell summed up his statement with reference to the amount of lands subject to irrigation in New Mexico as follows:

Mr. NEWELL. We have been measuring the amount of water, and if it could all be saved several hundred thousand acres could be irrigated.

Senator PATTERSON. Is that the limit—several hundred thousand?

Mr. NEWELL. I think so. The limit is the total amount of water which comes down the Rio Grande and Pecos.

So that Professor Newell took into consideration the two rivers in this part of his testimony—the Rio Grande and the Pecos. He furnished the committee later, and it is inserted in the testimony, with a table of the amount of water that comes down the Rio Grande according to measurements at two different points.

In the reports of the Agricultural Department it is set down that an average of 4 acre-feet of water leaving the stream to be conducted upon land will irrigate an acre of land. That is the average. There is an extreme maximum of 10 acre-feet and a minimum of 1½ acre-feet; but I find the average of the measurement of the Rio Grande River for over ten years, commencing with 1889 down to 1901, gave an average of 187,690 acre-feet. According to that, the Rio Grande River alone, without the construction of reservoirs, will irrigate about 200,000 acres of land. He does not give us any measurements of the Pecos River, but the Pecos River will irrigate even more land than will the Rio Grande.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How large is the average?

Mr. PATTERSON. An average of 787,690 acre-feet of water—and it will average that—up to the present time. An average of 4 acre-feet as it leaves the stream will irrigate an acre of land.

Mr. President, I find in looking at some department reports that there are a number of places in New Mexico of which Professor Newell apparantly had no knowledge. I will not undertake to read all about them, but will briefly call attention to a few of them. Reading from the Report of Irrigation Investigations for 1900 we find that in the Territory of New Mexico there is the Delaware River, from which a very considerable amount of land may be irrigated. There is another stream called the Black River, another called the Rocky Arroyo, and then the Seven Rivers, the Penasco River, and streams in Chaves County.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Where are those rivers located, I should like to ask the Senator?

Mr. PATTERSON. They are located in New Mexico.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I know; but in what part of New Mexico?

Mr. PATTERSON. I think they are located between the center and the eastern part of the Territory of New Mexico. I have not had the time to locate each of these rivers, but I have taken them up and they show the possibilities of future irrigation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course the Senator knows much better than I do, although I have given this subject some study, that merely because there is a channel marked a river it does not follow that there is a body of water in that river. It might have water for a month in the year, and the rest of the time be dry. As the Senator will remember, Professor Newell testified in regard to the Canadian, in the northeast portion of New Mexico. He had been there and he investigated the entire subject. The three rivers from which water for irrigation may be obtained are the Rio Grande, the Pecos, and the San Juan.

Mr. PATTERSON. I know, but these are all rivers which carry water that not only may be utilized for the irrigation of lands in New Mexico, but they are utilized for the irrigation of lands in New Mexico. The amount of lands irrigated from these streams is subject to very considerable expansion. Then we have what they call the Hondo River, in regard to which the Department uses the following language:

> The Hondo is formed by the junction of the Rio Benito and Rio Ruidoso, in Lincoln County. Both of these streams rise in the White Mountains, about 20 miles apart, and flow down through narrow and deep but fertile valleys. Their flow is not more than 15 cubic feet per second each, and the farming is done right along their banks. The return waters make the stream appear to have a greater flow, etc.

I can not read all that it says upon the subject, because it would become tedious. This is what he says of the productiveness of the land that the water covers:

> Yet so fertile is the valley and so perfect the climate that fruit and vegetables raised here are superior to those of almost any other section of the United States.

Then we have another stream, called the Rio Mimbres. That is referred to in the same book, and I will read just a little about it. First, let me mention in this connection that in 1898 Congress enacted a law donating 500,000 acres of land to the Territory of New Mexico for the encouragement of the construction of reservoirs—not ditches, but reservoirs—and these lands were selected by the Territory with reference to their possibility of irrigation; and the Territory passed an act upon the subject. This report uses the following language with reference to that:

> Under the encouragement of this act about ten associations or corporations have been formed, and within the next year several reservoirs will be under process of construction.

These are for the reclamation of land that could not be reclaimed by mere ditches. They are away from the beds and lines of streams.

> One of the first to organize and apply for a contract under this act was the Rio Mimbres Irrigation Company. This company proposes to store the flood waters of the Rio Mimbres, water that is now absolutely wasted, for the Rio Mimbres has no defined or known outlet. After leaving the narrow valley in the east-central part of Grant County, it opens out onto a broad plain, and even the flood waters are lost by absorption and evaporation before reaching the Mexican border, some 60 miles to the south. The surface flow of this river has long been appropriated, and some of the most fertile and best-cultivated farms in New Mexico lie along this river in its narrow mountain valley. Beneath the alluvial deposit and on top of the bed rock along this narrow valley is a stratum of gravel, and it has been learned through numerous tests that a considerable flow is constantly passing off through this gravel. An attempt was made several years ago to bring this underflow to the surface, but owing to faulty methods, or rather faulty construction, the attempt was practically a failure.
> It is also one of the purposes of the Rio Mimbres Irrigation Company to impound and utilize this underflow.

It would be too tedious to continue to read, but it is estimated that by this enterprise alone 40,000 acres will be reclaimed. It is estimated that every one of the 500,000 acres donated by Congress to the Territory of New Mexico will by eight or ten different enterprises be reclaimed.

Now, in addition to the reclamation of land by ditches and by reservoirs, in a great portion of New Mexico an immense amount of water can be secured by artesian wells. It would gratify the Senator very much if he could see the tremendous flow from one of the artesian wells pictured in this book. It looks as though it had water enough to irrigate the State of New York, spouting up, evidently, to a height of 150 feet, and the possibilities from these artesian wells are immeasurable.

Then again, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from New York to this fact: The use of water in all the Western country has been most extravagant. It is estimated that by what is called intensive cultivation and a careful regard for the proper use of water, where before 4 acre-feet were required now 1 acre-foot will be amply sufficient to properly cultivate 1 acre of land.

Based upon these facts and these data, and based upon the experiences of men who have lived in the Territory, with the possibilities for the economical use of water in view, the opinion of the best and the most practical men in the Territory of New Mexico is that, instead of 200,000 or 300,000 acres being the limit of land that may be reclaimed in the course of a comparatively few years, at least 10,000,000 acres of land in the Territory of New Mexico will be made to bloom and blossom as the rose.

Having those facts in mind, I suggested the other night that very great injustice was being done both to the Territory of New Mexico and to the Territory of Arizona by taking the testimony of a single man, Professor Newell, who is a scientist and a theorist and is not a practical man, with a practical knowledge of the possibilities of the economical use of water in irrigating districts. If these Territories are admitted as States into this Union, I believe, so strong is the love of justice in the heart of the Senator from New York, that within ten years, if he is then a member of this body—and I trust he will be—he will rise in his seat and apologize to the people of New Mexico and Arizona for having given credence to some of the statements that were made before the committee.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, I appreciate the compliment of the Senator from Colorado, but I fear that the difference between the statements he gathers from his publication——

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator let me read a short sentence that he may have it all before him?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. W. H. Llewellyn, of Las Cruces, N. Mex., in his testimony before the subcommittee, made this statement in reference to the Rio Grande alone:

> Gentlemen of the committee, here is the condition existing in New Mexico with reference to what we may expect as a permanent population. It has been estimated by Major Powell—

And certainly Major Powell stands as high in the list of scientists as does Professor Nowell—

> It has been estimated by Major Powell, who was formerly the Director of the Geological Survey, as well as by other competent Government engineers, that the valley of the Rio Grande, from Espanola, in Santa Fe County, down to the Texas State line, will alone support and maintain a population of a million people depending solely and entirely upon the pursuits of agriculture for their living.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Do you think we ought to admit Territories into the Union as States upon engineering estimates?

Mr. PATTERSON. I am glad the Senator has come to my side of this controversy and that he has arrayed himself against the Senator from New York.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not on your side.

Mr. PATTERSON. It is the Senator from New York who wants to keep New Mexico out of the Union upon an engineering estimate. I am objecting to keeping her out of the Union upon an engineering estimate, and insisting that the knowledge and experience of practical men are of far greater importance in a matter of this kind than any conclusion scientists may reach.

Mr. DEPEW. I think the great difference between the Senator from Colorado and me is that the statements which have been given him and from which he reads are those of the promoter, of the speculator, of the local man who is interested in booming the Territory, while mine are from a cold-blooded, clear-headed, thoroughly trained scientist who knows what he is talking about.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from New York allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to say as to Major Llewellyn that he is not a promoter. He has been a citizen of that country for twenty-one years. I knew him when living in the State of Nebraska. I have known him for probably twenty-five or thirty years. There is not a more upright, honorable man in New Mexico. He is not a promoter, he is not a speculator, and there is not a man in New Mexico whose word would go further with me than that of Major Llewellyn.

Mr. DEPEW. I am not disputing the word from his standpoint of a promoter or a speculator. I fall in with them all the while. So many of them come to New York with mining propositions that I have become acquainted with every inhabitant of both Territories. Philanthropically alive to my welfare, regardless of cost to themselves, they present to me every week the opportunity to secure fortunes that would make those now talked of all over the world pale into insignificance. It is not my distrust of their sincerity, honesty, or truthfulness, but it is of the basis upon which they build those tremendous statements.

I was induced some years ago, under statements in regard to irrigation, artesian wells, stored waters, and canals, with the wonderful production which would surpass that of any fields in the world, to make an investment in an irrigating company, primarily to make money, secondarily to develop the Territory, so that before ten years elapsed I might view the millions settled upon the reclaimed land coming here and demanding statehood—the owners of millions of acres yielding three crops a year by irrigation. The voice of the siren sounded in my ear, the siren being moved by stored water. [Laughter.] That irrigating proposition is still working. The lands are still there; the canals are there; the storage reservoir is up in the mountains. Sometimes water comes into it; sometimes it does not. It takes a large part of the revenue to get the silt out which is the inevitable adjunct of waters coming down from the mountains.

Mr. SPOONER (to Mr. DEPEW). But your money does not come out of it.

Mr. DEPEW. And everything else comes out of it, as the promoter said, except my money. [Laughter.]

Now, here is a letter addressed to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] by the educational association of New Mexico. I presume on this question the Senator from Colorado and I will agree that the educational association must necessarily be composed of the best informed people of that Territory, unless he carries his criticism of scientists also against the board of education of the Territory of New Mexico.

The board states:

> The statehood bill, now in the hands of the Committee on Territories, provides for granting more lands to New Mexico when she becomes a State, but the bill makes no restrictions as to the price or method of selling these lands. It permits immense speculation to occur to the sacrifice of our school interests. No State was ever admitted into the Union which needed more assistance in the establishment and support of a system of education than does New Mexico to-day.

Now, I read further from the communication of the board of education:

> From Governor Otero's report for 1899 (page 6) it will be seen that out of about 79,000,000 acres in the Territory about 24,000,000 acres are already included in lands and railroad grants, Indian and military reservations, and Government entries. It may be readily concluded and easily proven by observation that very little good agricultural land remains from which to select the lands already given or yet to be given to New Mexico for educational and other purposes. Large tracts of the Government land still remaining are worth but little, on an agricultural basis, even for grazing. A very considerable part has no value whatever, unless it be for the minerals it may contain.
> By the Congressional act of June 21, 1898, the Territory is not allowed any land declared to contain minerals. A very considerable part of the wealth of New Mexico is in its mineral deposits. Its future prosperity will come largely from the development of these resources.

This statement seems to negative and ignore those millions of agriculturists whom the hopeful imagination of my friend the Senator from Colorado sees gathering and cultivating lands around these mythical streams and marvelous springs.

Mr. PATTERSON. The theory of the Senator from New York is based upon a lack of knowledge of what the paper he reads contains. It may be true that there is relatively a small amount of agricultural land yet subject to be taken up by private individuals, but if he will examine the map furnished by Professor Newell he will discover that probably a third of the 70,000,000 acres have already been taken up and are now controlled by private ownership, and presumably the best of the New Mexico land is embraced within those areas.

The Territory was covered with Spanish grants, with hardly a grant for less than a hundred thousand acres, and some of them for four and five and six million. I presume there are 40,000,000 acres of the best land in the Territory of New Mexico now held in private ownership either by private individuals or corporations, the origin of the title being a grant. So the statement from this educational body in no wise conflicts with what the Senator from New York is pleased to term a glowing picture portrayed by myself.

May I in this connection show the Senator how New Mexico is growing in the matter of manufactures, because I know he wants enlightenment? I have here some figures taken from the census of 1900. Let me show the Senator from New York how New Mexico is growing in the matter of manufactures alone.

In 1870 the manufactures in New Mexico amounted to $1,489,868; in 1880 to $1,284,846; in 1890 to $1,516,195; in 1900, in a period of ten years, the manufactured products of New Mexico increased from a million five hundred thousand dollars to $5,605,795.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What were they?

Mr. PATTERSON. I have not the manufactures. I have the figures of the manufactures of the Territory of New Mexico, and am giving the totals as taken from the last census. As to the number of manufacturing establishments, in 1870 there were 182; in 1880 144; in 1890, 127, and in 1900 they grew to 420. In the matter of wages, which is some index of the growth of a State or Territory, in 1870 the total wages paid in New Mexico were $167,281; in 1880, $218,731; in 1890, $470,361, and in 1900, $1,350,586, a growth of 300 per cent in the amount of wages paid in the Territory of New Mexico during the past ten years.

In the cost of material used let us see what the growth has been. In 1870 the material used amounted to $880,957; in 1880, to $871,352; in 1890, to $691,420, and in 1900, to $2,914,138, showing that the new blood of the West had reached New Mexico and is circulating in New Mexico and is bearing the fruits of which the Senator from New York is so justly proud when applicable to his own State, but which possess no virtue of when displayed in the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, I am very glad to hear those figures in regard to New Mexico. I am afraid there are none of a similar kind for Arizona. But during that period see how the country has grown. It is said that the barometer of national wealth is iron. In the United States there were produced of pig iron in 1870 1,700,000 tons and in 1900 14,000,000 tons. There were produced of steel in 1870 69,000 tons and in 1900 10,000,000 tons. The production of cotton in this country has grown in that time from 3,000,000 to 9,500,000 bales, and the value of our manufactures from four billions of dollars to thirteen billions; and so I might go on indefinitely.

Mr. President, in one of the ablest speeches made on the side of statehood in the Senate, by a Senator who is always very careful and exceedingly studious in his researches—I refer to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]—he estimated that ten per cent of Arizona and New Mexico could by one process and another be brought under irrigation. That was his hopeful view as a statehood man. From that heestimated that in time to come there would be a million people in each of those two Territories.

But there are a hundred and fifty-one million acres in those two Territories, and if only ten per cent can be brought under cultivation, that is only 15,000,000 acres. It leaves a hundred and thirty-seven million acres of desert or arid land, of cactus and of alkali, to be represented in the United States Senate by four Senators as against the States which came in under the Northwest Ordinance, possessing all together little more territory, and those four Senators from the arid lands would neutralize Ohio and Illinois or Indiana and Michigan in the Senate of the United States.

[At this point Mr. DEPEW yielded to Mr. PROCTOR to submit a conference report on the Army appropriation bill.]

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, reverting again to the number of years of settlement, I find that New Mexico, with three hundred years of settlement and fifty-odd years of a Territory, has $5,605,000 of manufactures, while Oklahoma and Indian Territory, with twelve or thirteen years of settlement, have $11,000,000 of manufactures; that New Mexico after three hundred years of settlement has $7,000,000 of live stock, while Indian Territory and Oklahoma have $30,000,000 after twelve years of settlement; that the farm crops of New Mexico after three hundred years are $3,000,000 in value, while Oklahoma and Indian Territory are $43,000,000.

I am not without some personal knowledge of this water question in New Mexico. Having been born on the banks of the Hudson and believing that to be the most beautiful stream in the world, my attention has been called from early boyhood to the great rivers of the globe. I read all about the Amazon with its 3,000 miles of navigation. I took great pride in the Mississippi, the father of waters, with its affluents furnishing 4,000 miles of navigation. I studied the story of old Nile and of the Tiber, and then I would come every now and then to the Rio Grande. Every now and then I would find a glowing description of the Rio Grande, of the immense territory that it drained and fertilized, and the statement that it received its name from its Spanish discoverers of the grand river. I saw many of these other rivers, comparing them with the Hudson, and wondering at their size and their commerce, but it was only about five years ago when I had the opportunity of gratifying the desire of a lifetime to see the grand river of New Mexico. When we arrived at El Paso, without stopping for anything else, I immediately left the train and walked on and on to see this Rio Grande, to witness the commerce floating upon its bosom, to see its river craft for the carriage of freight, and its palaces, like we have on the Hudson, for the carriage of passengers, to view the wharves with their busy warehouses, and their thousands engaged in the traffic of the great river. After walking for more than an hour and not hearing the thunder of its flood nor the noise of commerce I turned and walked back. I saw an aged man who looked like the oldest inhabitant, and therefore likely to give me the truth. I said, "My friend, I am looking for the Rio Grande, the grand river of New Mexico. Can you tell me where to find it?" Said he, "Sir, you have already crossed it twice on foot." [Laughter.] And then, sir, I found that possibly the reason why it was called the Rio Grande is the peculiarity which those New Mexican rivers have, which belongs to no other streams in the world—their bottoms are on top. [Laughter.]

There is something about a contact on the affirmative side with this effort to let these arid regions into the Senate with United States Senators to remain here forever that fires the imagination of the gentlemen who favor it. Every little while we see in the newspapers an account of explorers across those great deserts discovering the bones of prospectors. The position of the dead and the location of the camp tell the story. In that rainless region the brazen sky, the torrid sand, and the clear atmosphere produce what is known as a mirage. There rises up before the vision of those thirsty travelers a lake, and they see the water and the trees; and the stock sees the water and trees; and the men and the women and the cattle and the horses go forward on their remaining strength in eager search for those visionary lakes, with their overhanging trees along the banks, which recede as they advance.

I am surprised if the Senator from Colorado did not find in the mirage the waters that were to produce those marvelous results which I am to wonder at and make apologies for ten years from now, after the four Senators from those States have been for ten years casting twice as many votes in the Senate as the two Senators from New York.

When my friend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] one of the most eloquent men in the United States, whether upon the platform or in the Senate, was discussing this question in the best contribution that has been made so far on the statehood side, he drew a picture of the conditions which would prevail in Arizona and New Mexico when the irrigation scheme had been fully developed.

In that picture the streams were let over these alkali plains, and we saw crop after crop every year of alfalfa grass coming up, and we saw the herds of cattle and of sheep increasing until the beef problem was solved, until the prophecies of those who say that the increase of population of the world is greater than the growth of the beef supply were negatived, until we saw that the best cuts of beef and the best quarters of lamb and of mutton had been brought within the reach of the poorest people in the United States for their daily food, until we had the surplus which would go abroad to feed the world and make up the deficiencies of old Europe, where the population increases so much more rapidly than the meat supply that a large proportion of the people now never know what meat is.

But the difficulty with the statement, when you come down to science again, is that cattle can only live when within five miles of a watering place, or what they call out there a sink hole, and that it takes thirty acres of grass to feed one cow. Now, these sink holes are wide apart. They have all been discovered. There is not one of them that has not been exploited, and there is no possibility of creating more. I had not then studied this question, and so it seemed to me as I was carried along by the eloquence of my friend that I saw in reality the old sacred description of the "cattle upon a thousand hills" and a thousand cattle upon a hill. But in the case of New Mexico and Arizona there are no hills, and so it was the cattle around a thousand sink holes, only there are not a thousand sink holes around which the cattle can gather.

Mr. ELKINS. Allow me to interrupt the Senator. How does he know about the sink holes? Has he ever been in New Mexico and looked at them carefully? Has he ever personally herded cattle there?

Mr. DEPEW. I would state to the Senator from West Virginia that I have not herded cattle there, but if he had heard my description of the Rio Grande, which I saw and crossed on foot, he would have known that I had been there and have some knowledge about water in New Mexico.

Mr. ELKINS. No: I would have said you thought you had.

Mr. DEPEW. Now, Mr. President, all of us would wish that these optimistic views were true. We wish they were realities and no pictures. Everybody who visits the Netherlands and goes through the Holland galleries and sees those superb paintings of the Flemish masters—those pastoral scenes—would like to have those scenes repeated, not in pictures, but upon the soil all over Arizona and New Mexico.

There is in The Hague a picture by Paul Potter of a bull under a tree with his herdsman, which was taken by Napoleon when he overran Europe and looted the art galleries of their masterpieces to enrich the Louvre. Holland bought back that picture for $50,000. It is valued at $500,000, and Holland would not take a million dollars for it. I wish that instead of its being a million-dollar picture with a solitary bull under a tree in The Hague that kind of cattle might be scattered all over Arizona and all over New Mexico. But at present they only exist in the imagination of Senators who draw these beautiful pastoral pictures to try and pass a bill—the omnibus statehood—by creating water where little does or can exist.

Something has been said here, in fact a great deal, comparing the conditions of the Northwest Territories after the ordinance of 1787 and the conditions which exist in Arizona and New Mexico. Sir, there is no one single possible parallel between the two cases. The one subject which was pressing the Union under the old Confederation was the conflicting titles of Virginia, Maryland, New York, Connecticut, and other States to that great Northwest Territory. Maryland did a noble part in leading the way by ceding her title to the General Government, and then all the other State owners followed. General Washington and the Congress of the United States wanted to settle that wilderness.

The conditions were not then what they are now; they knew that it was fertile and they wanted people to go there. So in the invitations which were extended and in the discussions which prevailed it occurred to the son of Gen. Israel Putnam, himself a general in the Continental Army, to settle this Northwest Territory for the purposes of patriotism by the veterans of the Continental Army, by the soldiers who had won the independence of the United States.

No such immigration ever before went anywhere. No such embodiment of gallantry, courage, and patriotism ever formed the foundations of great States as this of the veterans of the Continental Army in the Northwest Territory. They demanded peremptorily that slavery should not be permitted on that free soil. The ordinance of 1787, creating the Territory, had before failed in Congress because it had a prohibition of slavery in it; but these soldiers of freedom demanded as the price of their settlement that the prohibition of slavery should be put into the ordinance, into the fundamental law, and that then the law should be passed, and they had their way.

They did not accept these lands as gifts. They paid into the Treasury of the United States a million and a half dollars, which, judging between the value of money then and now, was an enormous price for the wilderness. But they stood there as a barrier against the savage Indians along the Miami, who were threatening western New York. They took possession of the disputed lands when the title had not been settled between Great Britain and the United States, and they built up those communities into States which have become the five great Commonwealths of the Middle West.

You can not compare those conditions and those Continental soldiers with their families, those patriots, all Americans, going there on the urgent request of the Congress of the United States, going there because Washington urged that it was their duty to do so in order to build up the country, with the populations scattered over this vast Territory of Arizona and New Mexico, at the rate, after hundreds of years, of about one to a square mile.

Senators, the Senate is now on trial before the people as it never before has been since the organization of the Government.

In one of the leading magazines for the current month a well-known writer on public questions has an article upon the overshadowing power of the Senate. In all representative Governments there is an upper house, but none like this one. In the British House of Lords the membership is hereditary, but it can act only as a check upon the House of Commons. It will defeat a radical measure once. The second time it rejects it there will be an appeal to the country, and then if a House of Commons is returned favorable to the measure, the House of Lords dare not offer any further opposition. If it did its abolition would be certain.

The English seem to like this check upon hasty action on important questions on the part of the popular branch.

In France the Senate they elect has no functions except in legislation. One of the most distinguished of public men in France told me that the Senate had been the salvation of the Republic. He said—and he was one of those who assisted in perfecting the framing of the government of the Republic—that after studying the legislatures of all countries the conservative men came to the conclusion that the best form was an upper house upon the lines of the United States Senate. So, while their House of Deputies is elected like our House of Representatives, the Senate is a delegated body.

France did not possess independent States as we have them, but the country was divided into large districts, and the boards of aldermen, the councilmen, and the members of the various cities and municipalities in the district and the members of the lower house from its subdivisions formed a legislature which elected the senator. He said there had been several times in the thirty years of the existence of the French Republic when in the stress of intense political excitement the House of Deputies had been swept off its feet, and except for the Senate there would have been a revolution—a revolution in which the country would have turned to a strong man and a military one, and in the overthrow of the Republic there would have been socialism succeeded by anarchy and followed by a dictator.

But in our Senate sovereign States are represented by two Senators elected by the members of the two branches of the legislatures of the several States, who are themselves the selected representatives of the smaller and larger constituencies which constitute the senatorial and assembly districts of the several Commonwealths. But our Senate differs from the upper house, either in Great Britain or in any of the countries of the Continent, in the vastness of its power. We not only have our legislative functions, but we are, with the Executive, the appointing power and the real treaty-making power.

The Senate does not assert itself in any offensive way. It does take an independent attitude on legislation, especially revenues measures, which would not be permitted anywhere else. This is submitted to because, as the limit of a Senatorial term is six years, one-third of the Senate goes back for instructions from the States every two years.

I remember in Senator Sumner's time that he insisted upon it that the Senate should not surrender, even on the social side, its prerogatives of precedence which count so much in the social life of every capital. He said that the judges of the Supreme Court and of all the Federal courts, the Cabinet ministers, the ambassadors and representatives abroad of the United States in every capacity, the whole military and civil force of the Government, receive their appointment by the joint action of the President and the Senate; that the creator is always superior to the creature, and that, therefore, the officers who thus owed their existence to the action of the Senate must necessarily be subordinated to the appointing power. Sumner was logically correct, but the Senate, which cares little for social matters, has surrendered or suspended its rights and permits judges of the Supreme Court to outrank it in the social world.

The Senate has been called upon many times in recent years, and has fearlessly responded to the call, to amend, check, defeat, or originate legislation. The fact that it holds the rein upon lawmaking and the estoppel upon the Executive is producing every day a closer scrutiny of the powers of the Senate, of its make-up, and of its representative character. By the admission, under one excuse and another, but always because of a temporary emergency for votes to carry the measures of the dominant party, of States with sparse populations and little prospect of growth the people have grown more distant from the Senate.

This is not a question of the election of Senators by the people or by the legislatures, for that would not change the result so long as each State, whether it has 7,000,000 of inhabitants or 40,000, has two, and only two, Senators. As the Senate is constituted today, sixteen States having a population of 6,000,000 people can, under the two-thirds rule required for the ratification of a treaty, defeat an international arrangement agreed upon by the President and the Secretary of State, and the rest of the Cabinet, and desired by the other 70,000,000 of the American people. As the Senate is constituted to-day, twenty-three States, with a total population of 13,755,364, and casting 2,363,285 votes, have a majority in this Chamber, while twenty-two States, with a population of 60,851,857 people, are in a minority.

The proposition before us is to give six Senators to a population of 800,000 in communities which possess little possibilities of growth in the future, thus adding tremendously to the discrepancy between the power in this branch of Congress and the people who are represented here. We make one Mexican in New Mexico and one Mormon in Arizona equal in political power to twenty-one citizens of New York and eighteen of Pennsylvania. Ours is a Government by majorities. Every year the sentiment becomes stronger for majority rule, and more and more impatient of minority dictation. It is possible to conceive of conditions where Senators representing a very small minority of the people might defeat legislation which the great majority not only demanded, but which was for the larger interests of the country.

I call the attention especially of the smaller States to the peril which they are inviting. Their sole protection now against a popular movement to make the Senate represent the people is the clause in the Constitution which says that no State can be deprived of equal representation in the Senate without its consent. But if for partisan purposes or to gratify ambitious friends in the Territories who are seeking national distinction, or for neighborly feeling, or for indifference, the Senate becomes more and more, year by year, with the introduction of areas as against populations, of farms as against people, of mines as against citizens, the stronghold of the minority, the people will find a way to remedy the difficulty and to control both branches.

If two-thirds of the larger States, impelled by political considerations to take care of the increasing number of ambitious and aspiring statesmen within their borders, should pass a constitutional amendment making the representation in this body based upon population instead of upon sovereign States, and three-fourths of the States, each having a grievance against the minority, should adopt that amendment, it may happen that in the refinements possible in the judicial mind "equal representation" could be so explained away in the Supreme Court of the United States as to hold that such an amendment was not a violation of the Constitution, or if a convention should be called by two-thirds of the States to amend the Constitution, in that convention the process would be simpler. That convention would be based upon the representation in the House of Representatives and be a popular body. The largely populated States would have an immense majority and could do as they pleased. From such a body would certainly come amendments to the Constitution little short of revolutionary against this minority representation.

Before Senators whose experience here has shown them the value of this branch of our Government invite an attack upon it, and encourage the hostile criticism which is growing so rapidly, they should give to the subject more consideration than this proposition has received and should hesitate long before increasing the distance of the United States Senate from the voter, the power and the principles of the majority of the American people.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. DUBOIS. I should like to ask the Senator from New York if he supposes he can get the support of the other end of the country, Delaware, for instance, which compares favorably with some of the Western States, and Rhode Island and New Hampshire and Vermont, to that proposition? All the small populations do not happen to be located in these new states.

Mr. DEPEW. They were the original States, Mr. President, without which the country could not have been formed.

Mr. BATE. Vermont was not one of the original States.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. DEPEW. I yield.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, and yet I must confess that after a quarter of a century's service, most of the time in this body, I can not hear with much patience the threat of revolution in this country; that the Government organized by our fathers is to be destroyed because the original plan by which the small States were to have in this body the same power that the large States have is now objectionable to the Senator from New York. It is not any small thing to talk about changing the political conditions in this country, changing the form of this Government under which we have lived and grown so great and so strong. You can not maintain in this country a Government upon the theory upon which this Government was established if you concentrate all the power in the hands of the great States.

The United States Senate was organized by the wisest men who ever lived on this continent, at least, and I think I should not exaggerate if I said upon any other. They organized it wisely. They provided that the smaller States should have in this body the power that the great States have, and now, after more than one hundred years, is there any reason for any man to stand in this Chamber and condemn that system of government?

New England, with its twelve Senators in this body, has not as many people as has the State of New York. Has this Government ever suffered, Mr. President, by the small States of New England being represented in this body? I say here, and I want to say it to the Senator, that he does not represent anybody in this country when he talks about breaking up the form of government which our fathers established, and which the experience of more than a hundred years has shown to be the wisest of any government ever established under the sun.

I have listened to a good deal of nonsense, and I have listened without protest during this debate to a good deal that I considered beneath the dignity of the Senate; but I could not listen to what the Senator from New York has said without saying here, as a Senator from one of the sovereign States of this Union and as a citizen of the United States, that I resent the insult, and I think the American people will resent this insult from the Senator from New York. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, I regret that the Senator from Colorado feels insulted by what I said. I am not advocating this revolution; I am not in favor of it; I would be against it; but when we add to the minority representation in this Senate and take it still farther away from the people; when we make the vote of one Mexican in New Mexico equal in this Senate to twenty-one votes in New York and eighteen in Pennsylvania we are calling attention to a condition where we can not tell what the people may do in the discussions of the future.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to say further, if he will permit me for a moment——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. For many years a number of Senators from some of the New England States have represented constituencies whose numbers were eighteen to twenty times smaller than the constituency represented by the Senators from the State of New York, but this is the first time I have ever heard any complaint on that account. I know the public service has not suffered by that representation, and I am sure it will not suffer if it shall continue.

Mr. DEPEW. The only difference between the Senator and myself, Mr. President, is that to his imagination—for the imagination seems to affect somewhat the discussion of this subject—Arizona and New Mexico are placed upon a plane with New England. The situations are not the same. New England is in the Union, and these other States are in the Union. The question is now, Shall we dilute the majority still further and call more acute attention to the conditions now existing where one-tenth of the people of the United States govern them through this body; that fourteen millions of people have greater power than sixty-one millions, and two and a half millions of voters can defeat the wishes of eleven and a half millions.

Except candidates for United States Senators or promoters who are anxious to secure for their enterprises the additional credit which comes from statehood, corporations who wish State or municipal aid and are barred by the provision of the Harrison Act which prevents Territories and their counties and municipalities from bonding themselves for more than four per cent of their assessed value, there is no interest to be served by haste in the admission of these Territories to statehood.

New Mexico has been applying here for fifty years and Arizona for a score, and there will be no harm done in waiting until Congress meets next December. The merits of these Territories for statehood have never been discussed before, and the country ought to have an opportunity of examination before we pass judgment upon their admission.

Oklahoma and Indian Territory united to-day possess the requisites of statehood in population and prospect for their future. If Arizona and New Mexico are admitted they should be united into one State. Even then they would have but little more than the number requisite for a Representative in Congress. It would be wise to make a permanent settlement of this question by thus creating one State out of Oklahoma and Indian Territory, and one State of New Mexico and Arizona, to be admitted after the next Presidental election in 1905.

The Trusts.

SPEECH

OF

HON. EZEKIEL S. CANDLER, JR.,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 7, 1903,

On the bill (S. 7053) to further regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States.

Mr. CANDLER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In my judgment, one of the greatest, if not the greatest, question now before the American people is, What shall be done with the trusts? They are leech-like, feasting upon the life blood of individual enterprise and attacking the heart of the Republic. They are defiant of law and absolutely reckless of the interests of the masses of the people.

They recognize no rights of the people and deserve no consideration at our hands—the representatives of the people. So far as I am concerned, I favor giving them no quarter, and I would cheerfully and promptly go to any legitimate extent to destroy them and make impossible their existence. No law to accomplish this purpose could be framed too drastic. The more drastic, the better it would suit me.

I am prepared to go to any length, to any extreme, to effectually throttle them. I have no patience with them, because they have no regard for the people. They are uncompromising in their methods, and we should turn a deaf ear to them and only hear the practically universal cry that is coming up from every section of our common country for relief from their heartless oppression and downright robbery. They should be outlawed, like the highwayman and the midnight assassin.

I am not opposed to legitimate wealth or to honest business. All honor to every man who accumulates much or little by honest toil and clean business methods. I will take my hat off to him, whether he lives in a mansion or log cabin, and say to him, "Well done, good and faithful servant! Enjoy that which thou hast, and accumulate more in the same way, if you can." But to the trust magnates, who have held up the people and forced them to deliver, I would say, "Get thee behind me, Satan!" I was glad to see the "Littlefield bill" pass by a unanimous vote.

I would have been glad, however, to have seen added to it before its passage the amendments proposed by the Democrats, but you Republicans, by your majority, refused to permit that to be done. Therefore it was all that could be obtained and, while it did not go far enough, still it had some good features, and I was glad to see it pass this House.

The whole bill is predicated upon the one clause of the Constitution—the interstate-commerce clause. It completely ignores the power of taxation. It refuses to invoke by any express provision the power vested in Congress to deny to such interdicted trusts or monopolies the use of the facilities of the mails, telegraph, and telephone. It fails to provide for any adequate penalty for default in making such returns as required by the provisions of the act. It fails to define sufficiently what shall constitute an offense under sections 5, 6, and 7, for which it provides a penalty.

It fails to give jurisdiction to the State courts over such corporations as are embraced in its provisions where such corporation does or carries on business, the same as if created in such State, as other citizens thereof are subject to such jurisdiction. It fails to place on the free list all articles manufactured or produced by a trust, and in many other respects is lame and defective. To cure these or many of these defects, and to make the bill more effective and perfect, the Democratic minority, at the proper time, offered the following:

Amendment No. 6: Amend by adding the following:

"SEC. —. That in addition to the grounds of bankruptcy now existing by law, a corporation shall have committed an act of bankruptcy, and shall accordingly be subject to proceedings to adjudge it an involuntary bankrupt and wind up its affairs and distribute its assets, first, whenever it shall have issued stock in excess of the fair, reasonable value of its property; or, second, whenever it shall have given or offered to any person, association, or corporation any privilege, preference, advantage, facilities, discount, or rebate denied to or withheld from any other person, association, or corporation; or, third, whenever directly or indirectly it shall have engaged in any conspiracy or entered into any combination, agreement, or understanding to monopolize or aid in monopolizing any product of general utility, or so much thereof as to affect injuriously the general welfare, or to stifle lawful competition, or to control or affect injuriously the price of or the market for any commodity in general use or demand; or, fourth, whenever it shall have effected or attempted to effect any consolidation, combination, cooperation, undertaking, or agreement with any other corporation, association, or person, contrary to any law of the United States or of any State in which it shall do or offer to do any business."

Amendment No. 8: Amend by adding the following:

"SEC. —. That any property owned or manufactured under any contract or by any trust or combination or pursuant to any conspiracy forbidden by the laws of a State, and being in the course of transportation from such State to another State, the District of Columbia, a Territory, or a foreign country, or to such State from another State, the District of Columbia, a Territory, or a foreign country, shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized and condemned by like proceedings as are provided by law for the forfeiture, seizure, and condemnation of property imported into the United States contrary to law; and every person who shall, knowing that any property to be owned or manufactured in any of the ways above described, transport it, or cause or order, or contract for its transportation as above described, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, be punished by a fine not exceeding $20,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be held to interfere with any proceedings in a State court for the violations of any law thereof."

Amendment No. 9: Amend the substitute by adding the following:

"SEC. —. That hereafter the following articles may be imported into the United States free of all duty:

"1. Steel rails, structural steel, tin plate, iron pipe, and other metal tubular goods; wire nails, cut nails, horseshoe nails, barb wire, and all other wire; cotton ties, plows, and all other agricultural tools and implements.

"2. Borax, borate of lime, and boracic acid.

"3. Binding twine.

"4. Paris green.

"5. Paper, and pulp for the manufacture of paper.

"6. Salt.

"7. Plate glass and window glass."

Amendment No. 10: Amend the substitute by adding the following:

"SEC. —. The President is hereby authorized, and it shall be his duty, whenever it shall be shown to his satisfaction that by reason, wholly or materially, of the existence of the tariff or customs duty upon any article, such article, or articles of its class and kind, are monopolized or controlled by any person, organization, or combination to the detriment of the public, by proclamation to remove or suspend such duty, in whole or in part, until the next assembling of Congress, or until the abuse prompting him to such action shall have ceased."

Amendment No. 11: Amend by adding the following:

"SEC. —. There is hereby levied and shall be assessed and collected annually the following taxes on all corporations, whether domestic or foreign, doing business in the United States for profit or gain, and having a capital stock of $200,000 or more, at the rate of 10 per cent on its capital stock. The amount of the capital stock of any taxable corporation for the purposes of taxation shall be estimated according to its par value fixed by the charter, or by resolution of its board of stockholders or directors, and shall include all assets owned by such corporation which are reserved or funded or set aside for the benefit of its stockholders.

"SEC. —. Those corporations are exempt from taxation under this act whose income (or profits), after the payment of necessary expenses of operation and administration thereof, is devoted exclusively to purposes of charity or religion or benevolence, or to hospital, medical, surgical, or hygienic purposes; or to education, or the promotion of the useful arts; or to scientific purposes; or to literary or musical purposes; or to public entertainment."

Amendment No. 12: Amend by inserting the following just after section 6:

"SEC. 7. That no person engaged in the production, manufacture, or sale of any article of commerce, or violating any of the provisions of section 5 of this act, or attempting to monopolize or control the production, manufacture, or sale thereof by driving out competition in any particular locality by discrimination in prices or by giving special privileges or rebates or otherwise in order to destroy competition therein in such locality, shall use, either directly or indirectly, any of the facilities or instrumentalities of interstate commerce, or in any way engage in interstate commerce for the purpose of aiding or facilitating, either directly or indirectly, such production, manufacture, or sale with such intent; nor shall any other person or corporation use any of the facilities or instrumentalities of interstate commerce or in any way engage in interstate commerce in buying, selling, or disposing of any such article of commerce for the purpose of enabling such first-mentioned corporation to engage or to continue to engage in such production, manufacture, or sale or control with such intent. Every person violating any of the provisions of this section shall be punished, on conviction, by a fine of not less than $500 or not exceeding $5,000."

Amendment No. 13: Amend by adding a new section, as follows:

"SEC. —. The words 'interstate commerce' wherever they occur in this act shall be held to embrace commerce from any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia.

"SEC. —. If any corporation liable to taxation under this act shall establish to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, by competent proof, under oath, that it is not engaged or about to be engaged in any way with any other corporation or person in any of the acts or combinations, conspiracies, agreements, or in any act or conduct that is prohibited in the act entitled 'An act to protect trade against unlawful restraints and monopolies,' approved July 2, 1890, or in the act entitled 'An act to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States,' approved July 24, 1897, or an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, or this act, or any amendment of any of said acts, the said taxes of said corporation shall be remitted except 1 per cent thereof, which shall be collected and paid into the Treasury of the United States.

"SEC. —. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, is charged with and is empowered to direct and enforce the execution of this act, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall make such regulations as are needful for such purpose. All laws applicable to the collection of internal-revenue taxes by the United States, whether civil or criminal, shall apply to corporations that are taxable under this act and to their officers and directors, and to the enforcing of the provisions hereof."

These amendments should have been adopted, but you Republicans said nay, and you, unfortunately for the good of the country and the serious injury of the trusts, have the majority in both branches of Congress. I voted for the Nelson amendment providing for publicity.

It was not near perfect, but again we were denied the opportunity to add to it, but such as it was, it being "a step in the right direction," I voted for it. Now, then, we have the "Elkins bill" under consideration. Under the "special rule" just adopted by Republican votes over Democratic votes and Democratic protests, under which special rule it is impossible to amend it in letter, word, or line, no amendments being allowed, and although it falls far short of what it ought to be I shall vote for it. I do so because I shall lose no opportunity to hit the trusts a lick, and the only regret I have is that we are not permitted to amend this bill and strike them a more effectual blow.

This bill is directed at the wicked and iniquitous rebate system by which many of the trusts have prospered and fattened. I would be glad to so amend it as to shut up trust-made articles in the States where produced and forbid their shipment at all across State lines, and to deny trusts the use of the mails, the telegraph, and the telephone, and to put trust-made articles on the free list, and thus take from them the benefits of the protective tariff.

Were it permissible under the special rule of this House for the consideration of this bill I would be glad to offer those amendments, but under that rule it can not be done. The time has come when the wall of a protective tariff should be removed from around and from under these trusts. We, the Democrats, say that the tariff should be revised and reduced, but you Republicans say this must not and shall not be done. "The cloud like unto a man's hand," is appearing, however, in Republican States, and the rain is coming, and I warn you Republicans that you had better get your big umbrellas and lifeboats ere you are drowned in the flood. There is no necessity for the exorbitant taxation now imposed by the Republican "Dingley tariff bill."

Under its provisions an average tax of 50 per cent is levied. There is now in the United States Treasury, including gold reserve, $372,362,861.66, surplus money for which the Government has no immediate use, and this surplus is increasing rapidly every month. Then why not revise and reduce the taxes and leave the money among the people and in the channels of trade?

The power to collect taxes is among the highest attributes of government. It is the power that takes from the people the proceeds of their labor and industry to furnish the revenue to run the Government. The Government should collect enough money to pay its expenses and no more, and the government which is forced to collect more money than is necessary by any political party robs its own people in the name of the law. That is exactly what the Republican party has done and continues to do, because it passed the present tariff law and refuses to reduce it, and by it the people this year have been forced to pay millions upon top of millions of dollars over and above what the necessities of the Government requires.

Last year a constituent of mine asked me for certain information, and in order to get it accurately I addressed the following letter to Hon. JAMES D. RICHARDSON, the leading Democrat on the Ways and Means Committee, to wit:

COMMITTEE ON COINAGE, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., January 17, 1902.

Hon. JAMES D. RICHARDSON, City.

MY DEAR SIR: Will you do me the kindness to write me what the average rate per cent is under the tariff laws now in force?

Also what the tax is on the following articles, to wit: Window glass, woolen clothing, hats, shoes, cups, saucers, plates, knives and forks, trace chains, steel plows, hoes, wagons, bagging and ties, gins, and cotton presses. Is there a tariff tax on the Bible? If so, what rate?

A constituent of mine asks me this, and I want to give him correct information. Your reply will be greatly appreciated.

Truly, your friend,

E. S. CANDLER, JR.

Here is his reply:

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 18, 1902.

Hon. E. S. CANDLER, Jr., City.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of 17th instant received. In reply thereto will say—

	Per cent.
Average rate under Dingley law about	50
Window glass, average in—
1900 was	66.36
1901 was	54.87
Woolen clothing, wearing apparel—
1900	84.38
1901	82.69
This includes hats.
Shoes, rate is	25
Chinaware, plain white, rate	55
Knives and forks (table), from	45 to 70
Chains	46
Agricultural implements, rate	20
Iron ties (for cotton), rate about	25 to 28
Bagging for cotton, rate	12 to 14
Books, including Bible, rate	25

Your friend,

JAMES D. RICHARDSON.

These are articles which enter into the expenses of every farmer. You will notice there is a tax on the Bible of 25 per cent. The Republicans actually tax the "waybill" to heaven 25 per cent. Under this law the trusts prosper, grow, and increase like the "green bay tree."

There are 82 trusts in the United States whose aggregated capital is $4,318,005,646. The number of trusts in existence is about 800, with a capitalization of about $10,000,000,000, and if to this is added the railroad consolidations the capitalization would amount in round numbers to $15,000,000,000, and nearly all of these monster organizations have sprung into existence within the past few years. Under this protective tariff they are sheltered and prey upon our own people and favor foreigners.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] a few days ago in a speech on this floor said:

I have a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in which he informs me that cotton-mill and spinning machinery is dutiable at 45 per cent ad valorem. I also have a letter from one of the leading cotton-mill men of the country, under date of September 13, 1902, from which I will quote the following:

"A carding machine can be bought in England from $375 to $400. The same machine costs in the United States from $600 to $750. Mule spindles cost in England from $1 to $1.25 per spindle. They cost in this country from $1.75 to $2.25 per spindle. Fly frames are in the same ratio. Ring spindles cost about $2 in England and about $3 in this country."

I merely mention this as one instance of discrimination.

My State, Mr. Chairman, is entering upon a great era of manufacturing. The day is not far distant when we will manufacture as much cotton as our State produces. Why permit this discrimination against us? Why allow an injustice to be done us? Why not allow our cotton-mill men to buy their machinery as cheaply as Englishmen? What necessity is there for continuing this 45 per cent tariff which the Secretary of the Treasury says exists? If you pass an antitrust bill which is worth anything nobody knows what the Supreme Court will do with it. That court may discover grave constitutional objections. But in the midst of all this dilemma we know that some relief can be given the consumer by reducing the duty upon trust-protected articles. Let us try this remedy. Republican State conventions have declared for it; common sense teaches it. You admitted it yourselves when you came in here and, in your desperation to do something, suspended the duty on anthracite coal.

In Mississippi we are building cotton factories, and I protest against this unjust discrimination.

This tax law strikes the farmer from every quarter because the first ray of light he gets in the morning is through a window glass that is taxed 66 per cent and the clock that tells him the hour to arise from sleep is protected and when he gets up he puts on his protected shirt and protected pants, sewed together with protected thread and buttoned with protected buttons. He puts on his protected shoes and ties them with protected strings. He washes his face in a protected wash pan and wipes it on a protected towel. He combs his head with a protected comb and brushes it with a protected brush. Sits down to eat in a protected chair, eats on a protected table and table cloth, out of protected plates and dishes with a protected knife and fork. Drinks his coffee out of a protected cup, sweetened with protected sugar and stirred with a protected spoon.

Breakfast over he puts on his protected hat and takes his protected bridle and catches his horse and puts on him his protected plow gear and goes to his field and hitches him to his protected plow with his protected singletree and clevis, drawn by protected trace chains, attached to protected hames, which work on a protected collar. He hoes out his crop with a protected hoe put on a protected handle. Day's work over, he goes home and at night sleeps on a protected bedstead, on protected bedding, and covers with protected blankets. Finally he finishes his crop and hauls his corn to the crib and his cotton to the gin in a protected wagon, gins his cotton in a protected gin, run by protected machinery, presses it in a protected press, wraps it in protected bagging, binds it in protected ties, and then sells it without protection in a free-trade market. Instead of enriching them we find that taxation has devoured their gains and encumbered their lands with debt.

But the Republicans say high tariff makes high wages. Well, explain to me how it protects labor and makes high wages to tax everything the laborer wears, from the hat on his head to the shoes on his feet, as well as the beef, pork, hams and bacon, butter and lard, cheese, molasses, grapes, wheat, flour, oats, corn meal, rye, barley, potatoes, raisins, vinegar, honey, rice and rice meal, sugar, extract of meat, pickles, currants, apples, salt, and condensed milk that he, his wife, and his babies eat; the spool thread, needles, scissors, thimbles, pins, buttons, beeswax, and penknife that his wife uses, the oilcloth, furniture, curtains, stoves, tinware, knives, forks and spoons, crockery, glassware, candles, starch, soap, combs, brushes, brooms, bedclothes, clock, and books in his house, and every tool and implement he works with to make a living, with an average tax of 50 per cent on the dollar. The truth is, it does not do it. It never did, and never will, benefit anybody to force them by law to pay a tax of fifty dollars out of every hundred they make.

And it does not make wages higher either. Now, let us see if it does. The highest wages in the world are paid in Australia, and there they have partly free trade and partly low tariff. Wages are higher in free-trade England than they are in France, Italy, Germany, and Spain, all of which have protective tariffs; and in China, with its "Chinese wall" of protection, wages are lowest of all. Furthermore, if wages were controlled and governed by the tariff, wages would be the same in every State in the United States, for the tariff is the same in every State, and the same cause will produce the same effect.

Now, take the W. T. Adams Machine Company, of Corinth, Miss. Every particle of material they use is taxed and taxed high. Now, if the taxes on their material were reduced, could that company not sell its machinery at exactly the same price they do now and make exactly the same profits and still pay their employees at an advance of wages proportionate to the amount of the reductions of taxes made? Of course they could.

Well, what governs wages then, if the tariff does not? Supply and demand. Here is the whole matter in a nut shell. Where you see two men trying to employ the same man, labor is high, but where you see two men trying to hire to the same man, labor is low. In other words, where the demand is greater than the supply, labor is high, but where the supply is greater than the demand labor is low.

Then what excuse is given for continuing this high protective tariff? Well, its the old time-worn Republican excuse that it is necessary to protect home industries—infant industries—as they delight to call them, although some of the infants are about as old as this country and have accumulated billions of dollars, and are certainly the oldest infants I ever heard of and the richest infants of which I have any information, and yet the Republican party says tribute money must be paid to protect and take care of them, although most of them are gigantic monopolies and heartless trusts.

I think the time has arrived to let them "stand alone" and to stop levying tribute money by way of tariff taxes on all the people to add millions to the accumulated billions of these favored classes. Therefore, in the name of the great agricultural classes, and, in fact, in the name of every class of good American citizenship, I appeal for a revision and reduction of the taxes in order to bring relief to them, and also to strike, in my judgment, a most effective blow to the trusts. I love my country and its brave and chivalrous people. In the affairs of Government there should be no favored classes and no North, no South, no East, and no West, but one grand united country of patriotic and liberty-loving people, a sisterhood of States of equal rights and privileges, "an indissoluble Union of indestructible States," all clustered around and bearing allegiance to the Stars and Stripes.

Indeed, would to God that "the angel of peace would kiss every frown from the brow of the Republic, and the smile of approving Heaven make glad the hearts of a great and reunited people." Then we, the representatives of the people, could and would forget everything but the common good of all the people and the glory of this Republic and enact laws in the interest of all the masses of the people alike, and not in the interests of a favored class, and then the trusts would be destroyed and the people blessed. The people are "watching and waiting," and God speed the day when their deliverance will come from the oppressive thraldom of the trusts and monopolies.

Army Appropriation Bill.

OF

HON. CHARLES H. GROSVENOR,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 13, 1903.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 16567) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904—

Mr. GROSVENOR said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I shall call attention to a time and to the circumstances when the effort to cast opprobrium upon the soldiers in the field in the Philippines did fail most significantly of the result intended by those who made a series of attacks upon the Army. I do not propose to enter into the discussion between the two distinguished gentlemen, the chairman of the Military Committee [Mr. HULL] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON]; but I have a pretty distinct recollection of a most graphic scene, an almost tragic scene, in this House of Representatives, when this question of the care of the soldiers in the Philippines was expressly and distinctly the question directly before the House, and when the attitude of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] and those who followed him upon that side of the House was very clearly marked.

It did strike a distinguished member of the minority at that time that somehow the criticisms of my colleague from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] now made were just. For I remember how Amos Cummings, of blessed memory, loyal, faithful, true-hearted American and Democrat, denounced the whole proceeding that was being led at the time, as I understood it, by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], and said that his right arm might be paralyzed before he would ever vote for the sustaining of the proposition which I understood the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] to be in the lead of. So much for that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, political reminiscences and post-mortem examination of election returns and election results are not usually very profitable. and yet they enter very largely into our discussion of politics. We look backward to enable us to look forward. It is much easier to discuss the past than it is to forecast the future. It is much easier to suggest what has happened than to be absolutely assured of what is to happen.

In the early days of this session I took occasion, in reply to a speech made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], who very vigorously assailed the Republican attitude in the campaign, to use some language which I will reproduce here as indicative of the spirit that I manifested on that occasion, and which is in the line of the spirit in which I now approach this important subject. On the 17th of December I said, among other things:

> The Democratic party in the early months of the recent campaign presented two propositions to the country about which they proposed to electrify the people. And they proposed to sweep away the Republican majority of the House, and pave the way to the immediate reorganization of the Democratic army, thus to get ready for the grand march of 1904 and the subjugation of the places of power now occupied by the Republican party. One of these propositions was the cruelty to the Filipinos as practiced by the American Army. Several tons of this literature were produced in this Capitol. A second one was to be the question of trusts. The question of imperialism faded away and the question of the overdoses of water administered to the Filipinos evaporated and there was nothing left but the trusts, and when the election was over there was nothing left of the Democratic party.

For that language—somewhat exaggerated—I was assailed in a good-natured way, to which I shall directly make reference. But first I want to defend myself for having used the language about the fading away of the Democratic party. Mr. Lincoln used to tell a story about a man who was the owner of a dog that he valued very highly. He made the mistake of administering to the dog, in place of a proper remedy for some trouble, an explosive, which in due time exploded and left but little of the dog remaining. Somebody asked the owner of the dog what he thought about that dog now. He said, "I think he is of very little use as a dog." [Laughter.] He did not say that there was not any dog left, but he said that as a dog, for the purposes of a dog, for the general usefulness and utility of a dog, there was very little of the animal left. So inasmuch as I did not qualify my words at the time, I now tell this anecdote as illustrative of the real meaning that I had when I said there was very little left of the Democratic party.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman to speak of the fading away of the Democratic party.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I find that the Democratic membership in the Fifty-seventh Congress——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not yield. I do not propose to have a lot of figures put in here.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman will not——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no; I am long on figures.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman will not object, I hope, if I interrupt him to show that the membership of the Fifty-eighth Congress has been increased from the Democratic standpoint.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, I am here prepared to show you a great many things.

Shortly after the delivery of that speech, of which I was just a little proud, I was staggered in my confidence in the propriety of the speech by an interview published first in the Washington Post, and thereafter very widely published throughout the United States, made by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. Everything that that gentleman says is effective. Everything he says is put in very forceful language, and the press of the country delight in reproducing his quaint, forceful, and eloquent paragraphs. Referring to my remarks, he said:

> The results of the November elections prove that the trend is toward Democracy. That we did not win the House is true, but we cut down the Republican majority by one-third.

Then he speaks of the coal strike, settled by a Republican President, but for which they would have carried the House, and coming to myself he says:

> Since the confusion of tongues on the plain of Shinar at the foot of the unfinished tower of Babel—

My friend is well posted on the confusion of tongues everywhere and the Biblical location of that unfortunate condition wherever it is spoken of in the Bible—> there never fell from human lips a more preposterous statement than that made by General GROSVENOR in the House on December 17, in these words: "When the election was over there was nothing left of the Democratic party."

> After winning a great fight in which the losses were frightful, reviewing the field of slaughter, Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, mournfully exclaimed, "If we have such another victory we are undone!" I commend those words to my venerable, vitriolic, and jubilant friend from Ohio.

[Laughter.]

Then he proceeds to prognosticate what the Democratic party will do as to several things that I may refer to later on and I may not. Naturally, after such suggestions from so distinguished a source, I began to look over the field of politics to see what had been the result of the election. I was quite aware, Mr. Chairman, that the election of last year was one which, if it had followed the precedents of the last forty years, with few exceptions would have resulted in a Democratic House of Representatives, for it has been very seldom, going back to the close of the war and the return of the Confederate States to their representation in the House, that we have ever passed the middle of an Administration with an Administration majority in the House of Representatives.

That is to say, the Administration comes in usually with a House of Representatives favorable to the Administration, but almost invariably and with only one or two exceptions, down to the incoming of the Administration of William McKinley, have we ever had a House of Representatives in accord with the President both in the first and second Congressional elections of his Administration. So it was a caution to the people of the country; it was a suggestion to those who study the principles of elections that with these very few exceptions, which I will not specify directly now, it has been the rule that the second election in an Administration has brought an unfavorable majority in the House of Representatives. There are reasons for it which I need not discuss and which are very familiar to us all. Disappointment in matters of patronage; disappointment among the people as to Administration purposes and action upon great political questions. So I say that this has come to be an axiom of American prognostication in politics, that in the second term of an Administration there will be an adverse majority in the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will my friend allow me a question there?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell us whether the House is now in accord with the President's recommendation as to reciprocity with Cuba? It did not seem to be in the last long session.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will tell the gentleman a good deal about that now, or I may speak of it at some other time. There is a large supply of good material on hand.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This would be a good time to tell us.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The McKinley Administration had for its support and indorsement in the Congressional elections of 1898 the Spanish war, and that in a large part, no doubt, accounted for departing from the usual rule in electing a Republican majority. But when we came to the election of 1902 we met first with the ordinary rule and result, and then we were met with the determined opposition of the Democracy and the feeling throughout the country, promulgated in some part, to some degree at least, by Republicans, that the Republican majority in Congress had not done what the people expected they would do, and among other things that we had failed to agree upon the President's policy of reciprocal trade with Cuba. I admit that that was one of the disturbing elements of the campaign, and then there was the great aggregation of capital, usually called trusts, that had not been successfully assailed by any new legislation in the Congress, and there was everything that is ordinarily present in a great national campaign to suggest the probability of a Republican overthrow in the House of Representatives.

Why, Mr. Chairman, if I were going to be personal in my remarks here, I might point out that so confident were our Democratic friends of a triumphant capture of the House of Representatives that the whole battle for its organization of the new House raged with vigor and splendor during the whole of the summer—a more effective battle was made by some of our Democratic brethren in behalf of their views of the organization of the House than was made against the members of the House running on the opposite ticket. The assurance was so great that pools could have been successfully formed and sold on the forthcoming Democratic Speaker and all the various offices of the Fifty-eighth Congress.

So, when the election was over, I confessed that I felt, and I feel now, that the greatest disaster, the most unexpected, the most far-reaching disaster that had occurred to a party—Republican or Democratic—since the close of the civil war, was the result of the election last fall. Not only was it far-reaching in its effects upon the future issues in politics, but it was far-reaching in its effects upon certain candidates for high office, not in the House of Representatives, for I do not refer to that in this connection, but upon the much larger field of national politics. And so when I used the language of my December speech I was but carrying into plain language the feeling that I had had, and no study of the question has changed my mind. Of course, I became cognizant of the able statement of the gentleman from Missouri, and looked about me very cautiously and carefully to see whether I had made a mistake or not; and I concluded that I was justified in all that I said.

Many years ago it was boasted by the Democratic party and their friends throughout the country that while we had occasionally and generally the Administration, they had a majority of the governors. It has only been a very few years ago since the gentleman boasted on the floor of this House that the Democratic party controlled the administrative government of a large majority of the States of the Union. Now, look at this whole matter. I want to present to the country a statement of the real results which seem to me to have been the result of the recent November election. It was a year of isms par excellence. There was a coal strike that came of conditions that nobody quite understood, and seemed to be impossible of restraint and conclusion, and it was an off year in every respect. No great proposition looking to the future benefit of the people was in direct issue in the campaign. Our Democratic friends had presented nothing, and—I speak with entire respect—there was no issue presented by the Democratic party, and, in an off year such as that was, that is the strength of the opposition.

They were opposed to the Republican party, opposed to its Administration, opposed to its foreign policy, opposed to its domestic policy, and they offered nothing upon which the country could rely, and so the time was potent for the breaking out of socialism, of disorganism, of political hope, of wreaking vengeance upon great men, and particular combinations of men, and everything was as favorable as it was possible for it to be for the results which Democrats so eagerly sought for.

Well, the election came, and I have looked at the map, and I have studied the past in the light of the probabilities of the future. Not that I understand or claim that it is inevitable that the result of the election of last November fixed with certainty conclusively the election of 1904, but I am going to point out how the country stands, and if there is any gentleman that can get out of this picture a hopeful view for Democracy, he is a genius in the manipulation of figures.

A long time ago, in connection with one of the great Cincinnati papers, there was a brilliant writer by the name of Bloss. He lived and wrote and flourished in the halcyon days of the Republican supremacy in Ohio and the Middle West, when every election went in favor of the Union soldier and the Republican party and every election went against the Democratic party, sometimes by smaller and sometimes by overwhelming majority; but the faculty of that brilliant man was this, that some time within the course of a week or two weeks, and sometimes under the stress of great occasions it would be a month, but in the end an editorial would appear pointing out how hopeful the situation was for the Democratic party. The hour was never so dark, the figures never so colossal, that out of it he could not extract some grain of comfort and consolation; and it became a proverbial expression that it was a Blossism when you boasted of how you escaped from an overwhelming disaster in politics. And I commend to gentlemen who have been conspicuous in showing this characteristic of the Democratic party, which has been maintained so long, a study of the situation in the United States with direct reference to its future.

Starting in at Maine on the extreme northeast, the home of true Republicanism and at the same time the place where the first budding of Democratic power in the spring of the year always finds a lodgment, that State elected 4 Republican Representatives in Congress and gave a total of 110,000 votes for the Republican ticket, giving a greater Republican majority than the average has been from the close of the war down to the present time. And Vermont came next—indeed, came first—with 69,000 votes and an overwhelming Republican majority. New Hampshire gave 79,000 Republican votes, elected her Congressional ticket, and will elect 4 Republican electors in the coming Presidential year. Connecticut cast 159,000 votes, and gave a tremendous majority for the Republican party, elected 5 Congressmen, and will elect 7 members of the electoral college in 1904. She gave a larger majority than had been dreamed of by the most enthusiastic Republican, and over against the confident prediction of the Democrats of the country that if they did not carry the gubernatorial election they would at least elect 3 members of the House.

Now, coming to Rhode Island: We have found reason for great cause of cheerfulness on the part of the Democrats, and my friend from Missouri speaks of it as a "revolution." He says, "The revolution in Rhode Island and the reduced Republican majorities generally in the Eastern States show that Republicanism is on the down grade." By some means or other, while the entire Republican ticket of the State, with one exception, was elected by a large majority and both branches of the legislature were strongly Republican, the election in a single district in the State resulted in a small majority for a Democratic candidate for Congressman. Shorn of his strength by the political power of the representatives of the State, the Democratic candidate for governor stands alone, a warning to the factions that have taken part in the factional fight in Rhode Island. They elected one Democrat. I think it would be safe to quote the language of the distinguished gentleman who quotes from another, that "another victory like that would destroy the last hope of the Democracy in Rhode Island."

Massachusetts gave a vote of 398,000 and elected 10 Republican members of the House of Representatives and 4 Democratic Congressmen, one of whom had no right to be elected as far as the politics of his district were concerned. And Massachusetts will elect 16 Presidential electors in 1904.

Now, coming to New York, there seems to be a hopeful view to the gentleman from Missouri of the situation. New York gave a Republican majority of only about 8,000 for the head of the State ticket, the total vote being 1,389,799. But she elected 20 Republican Congressmen against 17 Democratic Congressmen; and her electoral vote will be 39. New York was the place where the evil of the coal strike told heavily upon the Republican party. I need not refer to the circumstances surrounding the situation in New York, and surrounding the men who were held by the public to be responsible for the condition in the country. But if in 1902, with all those conditions favorable, and some question about the attitude of New York in 1904, the Democrats could not carry that State and could not elect a majority of the members of Congress, what force is there in the remark of my distinguished friend from Missouri when in his winding-up paragraph he states that the issues of 1904 will be the reiteration of the principal features of the Chicago platform.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is the gentleman aware that under a very partial apportionment the Democrats gained five Representatives in the State of New York, and reduced a Republican majority of 110,000 in 1900 to 8,500 in 1902? I commend to the gentleman a careful analysis of those facts.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The elections in New York are not always logical.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If they were we would now have a Democratic governor.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I remember that not very many years ago New York went either Democratic or close to it, and within two years afterwards gave McKinley somewhere in the neighborhood of 175,000 majority. New York generally is in line when she is needed, but after a while I will try to show my friend from New York that New York has lost her place as the Empire State in the great column of political power in the United States.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am glad to know that the gentleman's party is casting its eyes outside of New York for its power.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If I only knew, now, whether my friend belonged to that wing of the Democratic party which proposed in its platform in New York to take possession of the coal mines of the country and run them—whether he is a David B. Hill Democrat or some other kind of a Democrat—I would know better how much force to give to his remarks.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would answer that if the gentleman from Ohio will let me know whether he is a "stand-pat" Republican on the coal question. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am a "stand-pat" Republican on every question. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

I next come to New Jersey, the home and hope of Democracy, the State about which, in election years, the Democratic party is cheerful always in warm weather and sad always in cold weather. There were seven Republican Congressmen elected and three Democratic Congressmen, and I have not heard any complaint of any sort of gerrymandering there.

Delaware elected a governor. I do not know whether he is a Democrat or a Republican. I do not know whether he is an Addicks man or an anti-Addicks man.

Mr. CLARK. They did not elect any governor.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, yes; they did. My friend must get posted now.

Mr. CLARK. Why, the Democrats elected a Congressman and the Republicans elected a secretary of state.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have the certificate of the secretary of state in my hands. They did elect a governor.

Mr. CLARK. Well, in these books where they give the figures it puts it on the secretary of state, but it does not make any difference.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It does not make a particle of difference. There were only 38,000 votes cast on the head of the ticket, about half as many as there are cast in my Representative district. There was a Democratic Congressman elected there, but he did not get a majority of the votes or anywhere near it.

Mr. CLARK. He got the certificate all the same. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. No doubt of that; and so I will say to my friend, as he is getting a little bit special and personal on this question, that out in the State of Missouri where he lives, where we gave 48 per cent of the total vote for McKinley, and where we had a big rally and rustle in the fight of this year, the Republicans succeeding in electing one member of Congress and have another in doubt, and yet the gentleman from Missouri, I presume, when he comes to speak again, will talk about what the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has—an unfair apportionment of the State.

Pennsylvania was hopeful ground.

Mr. THAYER. It always is.

Mr. GROSVENOR. More hopes were expressed by the Democrats of the country as to Pennsylvania than to any other State in the Union. They were on praying grounds and interceding terms from the beginning of the campaign down to its close. The strike was there, turmoil was there, disorder was there, faction raged there, and yet out of 28 members of the House of Representatives the Democrats elected but 4.

Mr. THAYER. They would have elected more if they were needed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And my friend says they would have elected more if they had been needed. Well, a man born to Congress out of due time in a Congressional district in Massachusetts ought not to say anything about a little matter of that sort. [Laughter.] A Republican majority of one hundred and fifty thousand and odd in the State of Pennsylvania showed our Democratic friends how slim were their hopes.

Maryland. Maryland had received the touches of that political artist who is always anxious that men shall have full privilege to vote if they will vote his ticket, and no privilege to vote if they vote against him; and so, after disfranchising some 18,000 voters in the State of Maryland, everything was hopeful and happy. After a most delightful gerrymander by the Democratic legislature at its session in the winter of 1902, we lost only two Republican members of the House and carried the State by a large majority on the head of the ticket. That is a pretty good record, and there is no hope for Democracy in a State that rallies against a disfranchisement like that.

West Virginia was another one of those hopeful States. The prognosticators said they were going to elect four and possibly five, certainly not less than three, members of the House, and yet when the returns came in they showed there could not have been much gerrymandering down there, for we elected every one of the Congressmen, with a large majority for the head of the ticket.

Ohio. As usual, Ohio was not exactly hopeful ground. The Democrats did not expect that they would elect the head of the ticket in Ohio, but they were to cut it down to such an extent that a certain great Democratic leader, who had usurped the machinery of the party and run it to suit himself, was to make such a demonstration of power that he should inevitably, in the language of my friend from Missouri in the very eloquent interview which he gave during the campaign and which was widely published in Ohio, be reelected mayor, then governor, then President. Mr. Bryan came into the State and predicted that Tom L. Johnson would first be governor and then would become a winning candidate for the Presidency. The campaign started slowly, ran rather tamely, and in the end we gave the head of the ticket a majority of 91,000—far above the average of all our best years—and elected the same old number, 17, to the House of Representatives, giving to our Democratic brethren 4, and there will be 23 electoral votes there two years hence.

Michigan elected 11 Republican members of Congress.

Now, I come to Indiana, the former home of the great Democratic leaders of the Middle West, the State where hope springs eternal in the Democratic breast. In the early part of the campaign nobody in the Democratic party doubted that they were going to carry that State. It was to be the significant result of the year. The campaign opened with great vigor on both sides and was prosecuted with great effect, and the result of it was that we carried the State by 15,000 greater majority than we carried it for William McKinley in 1900. There is where the gains are coming from. We took a State that heretofore had been considered a doubtful State and carried it beyond the hope, beyond the dream of the most enthusiastic Democrat for two years hence, and elected nine Congressmen and will get 15 electoral votes at the proper time.

Mr. LINDSAY. Why don't you say what the result in New York will be?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The State of New York will give 50,000 Republican majority in 1904. Illinois is a great State, with a tremendous vote, with a great city, where labor questions, strike questions, and every possible complication of politics crowd upon the political parties, and while the campaign was in progress no man living expected a great Republican victory there, yet we carried the State by an increased majority, and elected 17 Republican members of Congress.

In Iowa there was some little disturbance about almost abstract questions of difference between leaders and factions of the Republican party, and hope again rose in the breasts of the Horace Boies of the State, and a great battle waged. And yet we carried every Republican district except one, and carried the State by a very large majority, larger than the average of the off-year majorities.

We are moving westward now, where the star of empire long ago took its way, and where the great battle of 1904 is to be fought out and won.

Kansas, with 98 counties, a large majority of which had been Democratic, where Populism cast its political blight upon the people of that State, and where at one time we had a large majority of Populistic-Democratic members—in that State they did not elect a single man, and we elected eight and carried the State by an overwhelming majority. Nebraska followed.

In Wisconsin, where there was turmoil, where there was contention, where there was doubt, we carried every Congressional district but one and elected La Follette by a great majority and carried the legislature by such a majority as assured the election of their great leader, Senator SPOONER, to a new term in the Senate. [Applause.]

Now we are getting out where there have been doubtful States and doubtful districts. There are none there now.

In North Dakota, represented since I have been here by Democrats, we carried the State by a large majority, elected a Representative to the House, and will elect her Senator. South Dakota elected both Republican Congressmen, elected the governor by a large majority, and gave positive assurance she is as firmly rooted and grounded in the Republican party as Maine, Vermont, or Ohio. Minnesota. Minnesota, where there has been division; Minnesota, where there has been a fight; Minnesota, where the merger was an issue; Minnesota, the representative of independent voters, of independent men—men who study politics as a science and vote conscientiously their convictions—gave an overwhelming majority to the Republican party and elected all but one of her Republican Representatives. Montana, that had been supposed to be wholly lost to Republicans, caught the infection of protection to her great products, caught the air that was driving across the great Northwest, and elected the Republican head of the ticket, elected a Republican Congressman, and well-nigh carried the legislative ticket to a successful issue. Nevada cast 11,318 votes, about one-third of the vote of my Congressional district. She elected a Democratic Congressman, and will possibly—not probably, just possibly—elect the three electoral votes Democrat, Populist, or some other variety that may present itself in 1904. Utah, Republican by a large majority. Idaho, where the labor troubles were, where we were almost hopeless, where the Democrats were more than confident, went with the tide that swept from ocean to ocean, reelected the Republican governor, elected the legislature, and has already elected a Republican Senator to take his seat on the 4th of the coming March. Nebraska, the home of Populism, the sister in distress with Kansas, the sister in all kinds of troubles and travails of the great issues that grew out of Populism that had absorbed the Democratic party, that State which is represented in the present Congress by four Democrats will be represented by one Democrat in the next Congress, and he elected not because his State had not gone overwhelmingly Republican and elected a Republican legislature and a Republican governor, but because of an unfortunate factional contest in the city of Omaha. Oregon, faithful and true, early in June elected her Congressmen and carried the State with the exception of a factional disturbance upon the office of governor, elected her other officers, all Republicans, all the State ticket, and is as firmly in line as the State of Vermont. Wyoming, true to her ancient belief, elected her Congressman and carried the State by a large Republican majority. California, where it was hoped the labor troubles were to work some great things for the Democratic party, elected the State ticket by an overwhelming majority, and five out of eight Representatives here are Republicans. It is true that we lost two.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like about ten minutes more.

Mr. HULL. I yield ten minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK. How much time do you want?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have got all I want, thank you. Very much obliged to you. The gentleman yielded ten more minutes to me.

Mr. Chairman, this is a map of the country. I shall say nothing in connection with any section of my country. My country is exactly what its people have made it, and her various sections are affected by the faithfulness or nonfaithfulness to duty of her constituents. South of Masons and Dixon's line I have not prepared the vote. I do not think I will. I do not care to put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD how it was that in 1902, in a great national contest, one State in the South, and others in the same ratio, elected six members to the House of Representatives by an aggregate vote for and against the whole six of them less than the vote cast for me and against me in my Congressional district.

I simply pause here, Mr. Chairman, to say that it is an unfortunate and forbidding condition of things. A State where the voters have abandoned the political power of the State to somebody else, to some organization or some machinery, is not a State that I think is living and coming up to the behests of American judgment. Of all the States which I have referred to as probably going Republican in 1904, I am unable to find one of them where there is a weak spot. Had the election been held last November for Presidential electors, the Republicans would have elected 310 and the Democrats would have elected 166. Three hundred and ten to 166; and yet my friend from Missouri says that one more such victory as that and we are destroyed. Did not he mean to say that one more such stride as that would leave the Democratic party without representation? Was it not that?

Now, my friend from New York who interrupted me first spoke of the hopefulness of the New York condition for 1904. I shall not discuss that question with him, for it is, in my view of the case, utterly unimportant. You may take Connecticut, which you can not get; New York, which you think is a possibility; New Jersey, which no man believes you can carry, and Indiana, which is hopelessly out of your reach, and then you will be whipped to death. What do you think of that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman from Ohio, considering his years, has more enthusiasm than anybody I ever met in my life. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. If my young friend from New York keeps on in the same ratio that he has begun until he arrives at my age he will be a dandy in that respect. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. If I keep on in the ratio that the gentleman from Ohio has until I am as old as he, the world will never see my like again.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope the gentleman may reach all the hopes that he has of himself and those of his friends. Now, in the few remaining moments that are left to me, I want to say that take every doubtful State; take every possible State, my friend from Missouri; take every State which you in your great enthusiasm believe there is a possibility you may carry, and then there is left enough upon the record of 1902 to win a splendid Republican victory for the members of the Republican party. I will not spend the time now to refer to the enthusiastic statement of the gentleman that they are going to reenact all the principles that are worth having of the Chicago and Kansas City platforms. This is what he says:

The Democrats will reaffirm all the essential features of the Chicago and Kansas City platforms.

If I only knew what the gentleman from Missouri means by his "essential" I would understand exactly what that platform is to be. He says it is to be all that are essential, and, among other things, they are going to have a battle on the triple proposition of destroying the trusts, reducing the tariff rates to a reasonable basis, and curtailing the public expenses to the needs of the Government economically administered.

Where the great gold States of New York, Pennsylvania, and all the East is to be when free silver and free trade and anticourt and all that sort of thing are to be reenacted as essential principles of the Democratic party we shall live, I hope, to see. The men who have fought each other for six long years will come together, the East surrendering to the West, and reenact all the essential principles of that platform, and it is the essential principles of that platform which have made the results I have referred to impossible. The efficacy of the Democratic division upon every one of these questiens will go forward until the rebound will come eastward from the Pacific slope and swallow up, not alone all the States to which I have referred, but the gentleman from Missouri will have a picnic of a time in 1904 to save the electoral vote of his own State where it can not be gerrymandered into Congressional districts. [Applause.]

Naval Appropriation Bill.

OF
HON. EDWARD MORRELL,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 19, 1903,

On the bill (H. R. 17288) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes.

Mr. MORRELL said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I am so firmly of the opinion that the new antitrust legislation, some of which places judicial powers in the hands of an executive department and some of which requires and compels persons to become witnesses against themselves and to produce their books and papers for inspection, is unconstitutional and can not be enforced that I desire again to urge the importance of what has been done for the enforcement of the older acts of 1887 and 1890, by placing sufficient means for their enforcement in the hands of the Attorney-General, and to enter my protest against the mischievous nature of experimental legislation. At the beginning of the session I introduced a joint resolution with a view to holding up the hands of the Department of Justice. I have on every occasion advocated the adoption of that resolution or some other which would effect the same object. Congress finally passed an act with a rider to enable the Department of Justice to carry into execution the laws of 1887 and 1890. I want my own record on this subject to be known beyond any question.

On a former occasion, while urging the importance of making a special appropriation for the enforcement of the antitrust laws, I called attention to the defect of certain proposed legislation, which has since been carried into actual legislation as section 5 of the act creating the Department of Commerce and Labor, and is now known as the "publicity" enactment. That section establishes a Bureau of Corporations, of which the chief shall be called the "Commissioner of Corporations," with inquisitorial powers.

And, as the law now stands, its language is:

(1) There shall be in the Department of Commerce and Labor a bureau to be called the "Bureau of Corporations," and a "Commissioner of Corporations," who shall be the head of said bureau, to be appointed by the President, who shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum. There shall also be in said bureau a deputy commissioner, who shall receive a salary of $3,500 per annum, and who shall in the absence of the Commissioner act as, and perform the duties of, the Commissioner of Corporations, and who shall also perform such other duties as may be assigned to him by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor or by the said Commissioner. There shall also be in the said bureau a chief clerk, and such special agents, clerks, and other employees as may be authorized by law.

(2) The said Commissioner shall have power and authority to make, under the direction and control of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, diligent investigation into the organization, conduct, and management of the business of any corporation, joint stock company, or corporate combination engaged in commerce among the several States and with foreign nations, excepting common carriers subject to "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and to gather such information and data as will enable the President of the United States to make recommendations to Congress for legislation for the regulation of such commerce and to report such data to the President from time to time as he shall require; and the information so obtained or as much thereof as the President may direct shall be made public.

(3) In order to accomplish the purposes declared in the foregoing part of this section the said Commissioner shall have and exercise the same power and authority in respect to corporations, joint stock companies, and combinations subject to the provisions hereof as is conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission in said "Act to regulate commerce" and the amendments thereto in respect to common carriers so far as the same may be applicable, including the right to subpœna and compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses, and the production of documentary evidence, and to administer oaths. All the requirements, obligations, liabilities, and immunities imposed or conferred by said "Act to regulate commerce," and by "An act in relation to testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission," etc., approved February 11, 1893, supplemental to said "Act to regulate commerce," shall also apply to all persons who may be subpœnaed to testify as witnesses or to produce documentary evidence in pursuance of the authority conferred by this section.

(4) It shall also be the province and duty of said bureau, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, to gather, compile, publish, and supply useful information concerning corporations doing business within the limits of the United States as shall engage in interstate commerce or in commerce between the United States and any foreign country, including corporations engaged in insurance, and to attend to such other duties as may be hereafter provided by law.

Notice that the second clause of this act gives to the Commissioner of Corporations, in respect to all private corporations engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, precisely the same power and authority which the law of 1887 confers upon the Interstate Commission. It does not define that power and authority directly, but by reference to another law. We must hunt out the meaning of the new act by turning to the statute books of the last century. It is of interest, therefore, to ask what are the inquisitorial powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission? Section 20 of the act of 1887 provides:

That the Commission is hereby authorized to require annual reports from all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act, to fix the time and prescribe the manner in which such reports shall be made, and to require from such carriers specific answers to all questions upon which the Commission may need information. Such annual reports shall show in detail the amount of capital stock issued, the amounts paid therefor, and the manner of payment for the same; the dividends paid, the surplus fund, if any, and the number of stockholders; the funded and floating debts, and the interest paid thereon; the cost and value of the carrier's property, franchises, and equipment; the number of employees and the salaries paid each class; the amounts expended for improvements each year, how expended, and the character of such improvements; the earnings and receipts from each branch of business, and from all sources; the operating and other expenses; the balances of profit and loss, and a complete exhibit of the financial operations of the carrier each year, including an annual balance sheet.

This provision, then, is made a part of the second clause of the new act, by reference and adoption. It is, in my judgment, unconstitutional and void, as I hope to demonstrate.

The third clause of the act also adopts by reference, as applicable to all corporations engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, the provisions of the act of February 11, 1893, entitled "An act in relation to testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission," and provides that those provisions "shall apply to all persons who may be subpœnaed to testify as witnesses or to produce documentary evidence. This is also, in my judgment, unconstitutional and void.

These two clauses of the new act come into plain conflict with the fourth and fifth amendments of the Constitution of the United States which provide that "the right of the people to be secure in their houses, persons, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated," and that "no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." The bearing of these two constitutional safeguards upon legislation by Congress has been thoroughly considered and explained by the Supreme Court of the United States in four cases, to which I wish to call the attention of the House. I refer to Boyd v. The United States, 116 U. S., 616; Wilson v. The United States, 149 U. S., 60; Pong Yuen Ting v. The United States, 149 U. S., 698, 739; and Monongahela Navigation Company v. The United States, 148 U. S., 312, 336.

I have on a former occasion referred to Boyd's case, which was decided February 1, 1876. The Supreme Court of the United States there examined a statute precisely analogous in principle to the sixth section of this new act. An act of Congress approved June 22, 1874, to amend the revenue laws had authorized any court of the United States in revenue cases, on motion of the Government attorney, to "require the defendant or claimant to produce in court his private papers, books, and invoices," and had also provided that "unless this requirement were complied with the allegations of the Government attorney should be taken as true."

This was declared to be unconstitutional and void as being repugnant to the fourth and fifth amendments of the Constitution. Justice Bradley, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

In regard to the fourth amendment, it is contended that whatever might have been alleged against the constitutionality of the acts of 1863 and 1867, that of 1874, under which the order in the present case was made, is free from constitutional objection, because it does not authorize the search and seizure of books and papers, but only requires the defendant or claimant to produce them. That is so, but it declares that if he does not produce them the allegations which it is affirmed they will prove shall be taken as confessed. This is tantamount to compelling their production, for the prosecuting attorney will always be sure to state the evidence expected to be derived from them as strongly as the case will admit of. It is true that certain aggravating incidents of search and seizure, such as forcible entry into a man's house and searching amongst his papers, are wanting, and to this extent the proceeding under the act of 1874 is a mitigation of that authorized by the former acts, but it accomplishes the substantial object of those acts in forcing from a party evidence against himself. It is our opinion, therefore, that a compulsory production of a man's private papers to establish a criminal charge against him or to forfeit his property is within the scope of the fourth amendment to the Constitution in all cases in which a search or seizure would be, because it is a material ingredient and effects the sole object and purpose of a search and seizure. * * *

Is such a proceeding for such a purpose an "unreasonable search and seizure" within the meaning of the fourth amendment of the Constitution, or is it a legitimate proceeding? * * * We do not find any long usage or any contemporary construction which would justify any of the acts of Congress now under consideration. * * * The act of 1863 was the first act in this country, and, we might say, either in this country or in England, so far as we have been able to ascertain, which authorized the search and seizure of a man's private papers, or the compulsory production of them, for the purpose of using them in evidence against him in a criminal case, or in a proceeding to enforce the forfeiture of his property. Even the act by which the obnoxious writs of assistance were issued (13 and 14 Car. 2, c. 11, sec. 5) did not go as far as this, but only authorized the examination of ships and persons found therein for the purpose of finding goods prohibited to be imported or exported on which the duties were not paid, and to enter into and search any suspected vaults, cellars, or warehouses for such goods.

The search for and seizure of stolen or forfeited goods or goods liable to duties and concealed to avoid the payment thereof are totally different things from a search for and seizure of a man's private books and papers for the purpose of obtaining information therein contained or of using them in evidence against him. The two things differ in toto cœlo. In the one case the Government is entitled to the possession of the property; in the other, it is not. * * * In the case of stolen goods the owner from whom they were stolen is entitled to their possession, * * * whereas by the proceeding now under consideration the court attempts to extort from the party his private books and papers in order to make him liable to a penalty or to forfeit his property.

After an elaborate discussion of the events and controversies relating to writs of assistance and seizures in libel cases Justice Bradley quotes from the celebrated opinion of Lord Camden, delivered in 1763, which is reported at length in 19 Howell's State Trials, page 1029, as follows:

Papers are the owner's goods and chattels; they are his dearest property, and are so far from enduring a seizure that they will hardly bear an inspection; and though the eye can not by the laws of England be guilty of a trespass, yet where private papers are removed and carried away the secret nature of those goods will be an aggravation of the trespass and demand more considerable damages in that respect. Where is the written law that gives any magistrate such a power? I can safely answer, there is none. * * * There is no process against papers in civil cases. It has often been tried, but never prevailed. * * * In the criminal law such a proceeding was never heard of, and yet there are some crimes, such, for instance, as murder, rape, robbery, and housebreaking, to say nothing of forgery and perjury, that are more atrocious than libeling. But our law has provided no paper search in these cases to help forward the conviction. Whether this proceedeth from the gentleness of the law toward criminals or from a consideration that such a power would be more pernicious to the innocent than useful to the public, I will not say.

After discussing Lord Camden's opinion, the court add:

It is elementary knowledge that one cardinal rule of the court of chancery is never to decree a discovery which might tend to convict the party of a crime or to forfeit his property. And any compulsory discovery by extorting the party's oath, or compelling the production of his private papers and books, to convict him of a crime, or to forfeit his property, is contrary to the principles of a free government. It is abhorrent to the instincts of an Englishman; it is abhorrent to the instincts of an American. It may suit the purposes of despotic power, but it can not abide the pure atmosphere of political liberty and personal freedom. * * *

As suits for penalties and forfeitures incurred by the commission of offenses against the law are of a quasi-criminal nature, we think that they are within the reason of criminal proceeding for all the purposes of the fourth amendment of the Constitution and of that portion of the fifth amendment which declares that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself; and we are further of the opinion that a compulsory production of the private books and papers of the owner of the goods sought to be forfeited in such a suit is compelling him to be a witness against himself, within the meaning of the fifth amendment of the Constitution, and is the equivalent of a search and seizure, and an unreasonable search and seizure, within the meaning of the fourth amendment.

The opinion of the court in that case covered 22 pages. It is an exhaustive and convincing argument against the validity of any such measure as that which is embraced in the sixth section of the act establishing the new Department of Commerce; but even if the opinion of the court in Boyd's case be left out of the question entirely, there are still other decisions which, as I have already said, would render the work mapped out in the act for the Bureau of Corporations abortive. Nor is this all. There is also a statute which destroys the effectiveness of the new law, and one which can not be rendered ineffective by the later law without violating the fifth amendment to the Constitution. I refer to the act of March 16, 1878 (20 Stat. L., p. 30, ch. 37), which applies to all "complaints and other proceedings" against persons charged with the commission of crimes, offenses, and misdemeanors in United States courts and in "courts of inquiry," and provides that "the person so charged shall, at his own request, but not otherwise, be a competent witness; and that his failure to make such request shall not create any presumption against him."

The construction put upon this statute by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Wilson v. United States is such as to make it impossible for the new Commissioner of Corporations to require, under the authority given him, any such sweeping reports as those described in section 20 of the interstate-commerce act of 1887. I shall refer to that Wilson case again further on. The common carriers from whom such reports may be required are quasi-public corporations, and Congress has the power to require such reports from them on the same principle that it may require persons engaged in the production of articles subject to excise taxes to produce their books and papers for inspection, or may require aliens to produce whatever evidence it likes in certain cases. But strictly private corporations stand upon the footing of private citizens and can not be so "required" to disclose their private affairs. Consider the meaning of the word "require." According to Webster's Dictionary it means: "To demand; to ask as of right and by authority; to claim; to render necessary, as a duty or anything indispensable."

The word does not signify a mere request, but it has a mandatory force and implies coercion in case the requirement is disregarded. How and by whom is such coercion to be applied? The Commissioner of Corporations shall (not may, but shall) apply it in the manner provided for in section 20 of the interstate-commerce act. He "shall have and exercise the same power and authority in respect to corporations, joint stock companies, and combinations subject to the provisions hereof as is conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission * * * in respect to common carriers, so far as the same may be applicable." This section also includes the right to issue subpœnas and compel attendance and testimony, and the production of documentary evidence, and it provides that the plea of incrimination will not excuse a witness from testifying.

Mr. Speaker, I have referred to the case of Wilson against The United States (149 U. S., 60). That case was decided April 17, 1893, and well illustrates one point of my present argument. It was a case in which the defendant, Wilson, was indicted for violating an act of Congress prohibiting the use of the mails for giving information when and by what means obscene publications might be obtained. He did not request to be a witness or offer himself as such, and the district attorney commented on that fact. Wilson was convicted and sentenced, but the Supreme Court of the United States reversed the judgment of the district court and remanded the cause, with directions to award a new trial on the ground that the statute of March 16, 1878, had been violated by the failure of the trial court to exclude from the jury all comment upon the fact that the defendant had not requested to become a witness in his own behalf.

As will be remembered, the act of 1878 provides that the defendant "shall at his own request, but not otherwise, be a competent witness; and his failure to make such request shall not create any presumption against him." If, then, the defendant does not request to be made a witness, he is not competent. He could not under the Constitution be compelled to be a witness. The fifth amendment protects him to that extent. And the statute of 1878 was framed with a due regard to those who might prefer to rely upon the presumption of innocence which the law gives to everyone; for in no case, according to that act, shall the failure of anyone to request to be a witness create any presumption against him. How different is the spirit of this new anti-trust law. It gives the Commissioner of Corporations "power and authority * * * to compel persons to attend as witnesses, to testify, and to produce documentary evidence."

I have already shown that it is unconstitutional to "require" persons to do such things. What is the difference between requiring and compelling? Compel means "to drive or urge with force; to constrain; to oblige; to coerce." This is the definition given by the Century Dictionary. The same authority says that "require" means "to ask or claim as of right and by authority; to demand; insist on having; exact; to render necessary or indispensable." And this agrees with the definition given by Webster, which I have already quoted. I repeat, then, if you can not require a man to do a thing, how much less can you compel him to do it? For, clearly "compel" is a stronger term than "require." And if Congress can not constitutionally either require or compel any citizen of the United States to be a witness against himself or to produce his private "papers and effects" in any court where such production might directly or indirectly subject him to a penalty of any kind or to a forfeiture of any part or his property; if the corporations are to be competent to make reports, and thus become witnesses, only upon their own request, and if their failure to make such request shall not create any presumption against them, of what possible utility is all this antitrust legislation?

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call particular attention to the Chinese-exclusion cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, May 15, 1893 (149 U. S., 698 to 763). In that case the court upheld the act of May 5, 1892, requiring all Chinese laborers within the United States at the time of its passage, "and who are entitled to remain in the United States," to apply within one year to a collector of internal revenue for a certificate of residence; and providing that anyone who does not do so, or is afterwards found in the United States without such a certificate "shall be deemed and adjudged to be unlawfully in the United States" and may be arrested by any officer of the customs, or collector of internal revenue, or marshal, or the deputy of either, and taken before a United States judge, who shall order him to be deported from the United States to his own country, unless he shall clearly establish to the satisfaction of the judge that by reason of accident, sickness, or other unavoidable cause, he was unable to procure his certificate, and "by at least one credible white witness," that he was a resident of the United States at the time of the passage of the act.

But the constitutionality of the act was denied by the Chief Justice and Justices Field and Brewer. And the majority of the court placed their opinion upon the ground of the inherent sovereignty of every nation, according to the principles of international law, to forbid the entrance of foreigners into its dominions or to admit them only in such cases and upon such conditions as it may prescribe. (See 149 U. S., 705, citing 130 U. S., 581, 603, and 142 U. S., 651, 659.) And on the authority of Vattel the court declared that the nation also has the right to send foreigners elsewhere, if it has just cause to fear that they will corrupt the manners of the citizens, that they will create religious disturbances, or occasion any other disorder contrary to the public safety; in a word, that it has the right, and is even obliged, in this respect, to follow the rules which prudence dictates. (149 U. S., 708.)

The court then cites the constitutional grant of power to Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations, including the entrance of ships, the importation of goods, and the bringing of persons into the United States; and also cites the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization and the sweeping clause which gives to Congress the power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution these powers and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof. (149 U. S., 712.) And the court therefore held that—

> The power to exclude or to expel aliens, being a power affecting international relations, is vested in the political department of the Government, and is to be regulated by treaty or by act of Congress, and to be executed by the executive authority according to the regulations so established, except so far as the judicial authority has been authorized by treaty or by statute, or is required by the paramount law of the Constitution, to intervene. (149 U. S., 713.)
> The power to exclude aliens and the power to expel them rest upon one foundation, are derived from one source, are supported by the same reasons, and are in truth but parts of one and the same power.
> The power of Congress, therefore, to expel aliens, like the power to exclude aliens, or any specified class of aliens, from the country, may be exercised entirely through executive officers; or Congress may call in the aid of the judiciary to ascertain any contested facts on which an alien's right to be in the country has been made by Congress to depend. (149 U. S., 713, 714.)

Mr. Speaker, I am ready to concede that Congress may with respect to aliens exercise its powers entirely through executive officers without the intervention of the judiciary; and I believe that our laws of alienage and our immigration and naturalization laws ought to be more stringent than they are; but I can never concede to Congress the right to exercise through a commissioner of corporations or through other executive officers the powers enumerated in section 6 of the act to establish a Department of Commerce and Labor.

The persons affected by that section are not aliens, but citizens of the United States or of the several States—citizens living under the protection of the fourth and fifth amendments of the Constitution. And in order to prove that the reasoning of the court in respect to aliens under the right of Congress to regulate foreign commerce was not intended to apply to citizens under the power to regulate interstate commerce, so far as to allow an inquisitorial tribunal to be set up in an executive department, and clothed with the tremendous and dangerous powers conferred by the new act on the Commissioner of Corporations, I call attention to another decision rendered only a short time previous to that above quoted.

In the case of Monongahela Navigation Company v. United States (148 U. S., 312, 336) the court said:

> Like the other powers granted to Congress by the Constitution, the power to regulate commerce is subject to all the limitations imposed by that instrument, and among them is that of the fifth amendment we have above quoted. Congress has supreme control over the regulation; but if, in exercising that supreme control, it deems it necessary to take private property, then it must proceed subject to the limitations imposed by the fifth amendment, and can take only on payment of just compensation,

If Congress could authorize the Commissioner of Corporations to violate the Constitution in respect to unreasonable searches and seizure of the books, papers, and effects of the citizen, or could require or compel him to be a witness against himself, it could as properly authorize him to take any citizen's private property for public use without any compensation whatever. It could as rightfully authorize him to administer torture for the purpose of extracting evidence to be used against himself or his family or his business partners. If Congress could do any one of these things the guaranties of "life, liberty, and property," named in the Constitution as belonging to the people, would be theirs by sufferance only and not of right.

Mr. Speaker, this new legislation is obnoxious to the very criticism which Justice Bradley, speaking for the court in Boyd v. United States (116 U. S., 616, 635), pronounced against the violation of the fourth and fifth amendments then complained of:

> Illegitimate and unconstitutional practices get their first footing in that way, namely, by silent approaches and slight deviations from legal modes of procedure. This can only be obviated by adhering to the rule that constitutional provisions for the security of person and property should be liberally construed. A close literal construction deprives them of half their efficacy, and leads to gradual depreciation of the right, as if it consisted more in sound than in substance. It is the duty of courts to be watchful of the constitutional rights of the citizen, and against any stealthy encroachments thereon. Their motto should be obsta principiis.

Mr. Speaker, who will doubt, after examining the cases to which I have referred, that the Supreme Court will declare section 6 of the act to create the Department of Commerce unconstitutional? And if it should do that, who will doubt that it would also pronounce unconstitutional the following clauses of "the act to further regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States," known as the Elkins antirebate law:

> Every person or corporation who shall offer, grant, or give or solicit, accept, or receive any such rebates, concession, or discrimination shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $20,000. * * *
> That in any proceeding for the enforcement of the provisions of the statutes relating to interstate commerce, whether such proceedings be instituted before the Interstate Commerce Commission or be begun originally in any circuit court of the United States, it shall be lawful to include as parties, in addition to the carrier, all persons interested in or affected by the rate, regulation, or practice under consideration, and inquiries, investigations, orders, and decrees may be made with reference to and against such additional parties in the same manner, to the same extent, and subject to the same provisions as are or shall be authorized by law with respect to carriers.

The House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, in their report (No. 3765) to accompany the bill (S. 7053) which became the law in question, on pages 5 and 6 of their report, explained the meaning of those parts of the bill and the intention of Congress, as follows:

> Second. The existing law prohibits rebates and discriminations, but does not prevent the cutting of published rates unless discrimination is shown. In most cases it is practically impossible to show the discrimination. In the investigations made by the Interstate Commerce Commission respecting rates on dressed beef and packing-house products from Kansas City and Chicago, it was finally discovered that for years the railroads had constantly and habitually disregarded their published tariffs and had carried such products at rates below the published tariff to an amount so great that the difference between the published tariff and the actual rate amounted to millions of dollars a year, and it was the unanimous testimony that all the shippers who were interested in those rates got practically the same rate. There was, therefore, no discrimination between the shippers, and no shipper was liable to prosecution for obtaining a rate which discriminated in his favor. But the effect of such secret cutting of rates is to place in the hands of a small aggregation of shippers the absolute control of the business, because no person can afford to enter into competition who does not receive the cut of rates, and no person is in a position to demand or receive such cut until after he shall have become established in business and have an extensive business behind him.
> The bill which we recommend provides a penalty, by fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $20,000, against any person or corporation which shall give or receive any rebate, concession, or discrimination in respect of the transportation of property whereby such property shall be transported at a less rate than that named in the tariffs published and filed in accordance with the interstate-commerce law. This provision makes it a penalty against the railroad company to give to anyone a rate less than the published rate while that rate remains in force, and it also makes it a penalty against any person receiving the benefit of a rate less than the published rates.
> Chairman Knapp stated to your committee that he favored making it a penal offense to make any departure from the published rates, whether there be a discrimination or not. Mr. Knapp said:
> "I want two things: I want the corporation carrier made liable, and I want the shipper made liable when he accepts a preference or secret rate, whether there is discrimination or not."
> Third. Section 2 of the bill makes it lawful to include as parties to any proceeding for the enforcement of the interstate-commerce act, in addition to the carrier, all persons interested in or affected by the rate, regulation, or practice under consideration, and authorizes final judgment against such additional party.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the decisions of the courts which I have cited, I should like to know how anyone can expect the enforcement of such acts as this. Surely if the act establishing a Department of Commerce and Labor is not constitutional—and I submit that it is not in so far as the powers conferred on the Commissioner of Labor are concerned—the antirebate law, approved February 18, 1903, is no less unconstitutional in respect of those parts of it which I have quoted.

It is claimed that Congress has, by an appropriation of $500,000, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney-General, contained in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, met the demand of the President, as embodied in the joint resolution introduced by me on the 3d of December, 1902. The Washington Post of February 18, 1903, says:

The ample provision made for prosecutions under the Sherman Act constitute a long and firm step in the direction which this Congress was not confidently expected to take.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the more I reflect upon this matter the more firmly I am convinced of the wisdom of the President in recommending a special appropriation for the purpose of enabling the Attorney-General to execute existing laws, rather than a policy of imperialism and Quixotism as embodied in the Nelson and Elkins propositions. As I said in the beginning, somebody will be held responsible for what has been done, as well as for what has not been done by us at this session of Congress; and I want it to be understood that I have at all times tried to carry out the only practicable scheme which has yet been suggested for lessening the evils of trusts; that I have not willingly supported any unconstitutional or irrational scheme; that I have adhered to the opinions of the courts whose province and duty it is to speak the last word and the prevailing sentence regarding all our acts in their relation to the Constitution.

The "Selling Combination" and the Trusts.

OF

HON. JAMES A. TAWNEY,

OF MINNESOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 7, 1903.

The House being in Committee of the Whole and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 17) requiring all corporations engaged in interstate commerce to file returns with the Secretary of the Treasury, disclosing their true financial condition, and of their capital stock, and imposing a tax upon such as have outstanding capital stock unpaid in whole or in part—

Mr. TAWNEY said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I offer as a new section the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. That when two or more persons, firms, or corporations engaged in the production of articles or products and the sale of the same in States other than the State in which such products or articles are produced enter into an association, combination, or agreement fixing the price at which their products, or any of them, shall be sold, and offering to purchasers of such products a rebate or premium on the amount of their purchases from such persons, firms, or corporations on condition that all of the purchases of such purchasers for a given period shall be of the products specified by such persons, firms, or corporations, members of such association or combination or parties to such agreement, then and in such case such persons, firms, or corporations shall be deemed to have formed a conspiracy against trade, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $5,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. The amendment which has just been read, and which I propose as a new section of the bill under consideration, is intended to apply to and make impossible a class of combinations differing from those which this bill in general relates to. This bill deals with individual corporations engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and provides that these corporations shall file certain returns with the Interstate Commerce Commission, prescribing what these returns shall contain or show in connection with the purpose of the corporation, its authorized capital stock, the character of the same, amount received therefor, etc., under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Commission, and prescribing certain penalties for the failure on the part of officers of such corporations to make such return or for the making of a false return. It also provides for the publication of an abstract of these returns by the Commission, and gives to the Commission authority to inquire into the management of the business of such corporations. It also proposes to prohibit the granting of rebates, concessions, or special facilities of service in respect to the transportation of any property, and contains many other provisions intended to prevent these corporations from monopolizing or controlling the production, manufacture, and sale of any article of commerce. But I do not find in the bill anywhere any provision that would prevent independent corporations from forming what is to-day known as "selling combinations," a combination which has become almost universal in many manufacturing industries not controlled by gigantic corporations, commonly called "trusts."

To my mind, Mr. Chairman, the so-called "selling combination" is a more dangerous combination and is more effective in the matter of destroying competition than any other, because these selling combinations, organized as I will show, can and do more completely monopolize the market for the sale of manufactured articles than do any of the so-called trusts. The selling combination affords to the smaller independent corporations in every line of industry the opportunity not only of destroying competition in the sale of their products, but the opportunity of demanding and receiving from the wholesaler and the consumer an exorbitant price. The two most notable instances where independent corporations have entered into a selling combination are in the pottery and glass industries.

It may be that the present law, known as the Sherman antitrust law, if enforced, would make these selling combinations impossible and dissolve those now in existence. But they do exist and have existed so long, and the knowledge of their existence and their effect upon trade, without any effort to prevent their formation or to dissolve those in existence, is so generally known that I infer it to be the opinion of those charged with the duty of enforcing the law that the existing antitrust law is inadequate for that purpose. It is for this reason I have offered the amendment, in the hope that it may be adopted, and if adopted I believe it would certainly enable the legal department of the Government to institute proceedings against those who have formed these combinations that would result in their destruction.

Mr. Chairman, I have in my possession, and for the information of the House will presently read, evidence of the existence of a selling combination formed by thirty-six independent corporations engaged in the manufacture and sale of pottery. This evidence, as the members of the House will observe, is conclusive upon the fact of the existence of a selling combination in this particular industry, and I am informed by dealers and wholesalers that the same plan to control the price and monopolize the market for the sale of glass has been in use by the independent corporations engaged in the manufacture of that article. The evidence I refer to consists of a letter and a confidential premium circular sent to the trade by the Pottery Association, with headquarters at East Liverpool, Ohio. This letter and circular are signed by the Pottery Association, by Charles E. Macrum, secretary. The manner in which this evidence came into my possession is worthy of notice, for the reason that it shows how completely the jobbers and wholesalers are at the mercy of this combination. They fear the consequences in the event that the existence and methods of this combination should be made public through their instrumentality. The letter was handed to me a few days ago by one who is not in any way connected with the pottery trade, either as a manufacturer or as a dealer. This fact was known to me, and when I inquired as to how these confidential communications came into his possession he informed me that they were shown to him and he was allowed to make copies of the originals on the condition that the name of the jobber would not be disclosed and that the serial number which the confidential premium circular bears should not be copied or in any manner revealed.

The letter referred to reads as follows:

THE POTTERY ASSOCIATION,
East Liverpool, Ohio, December 27, 1902.

GENTLEMEN: At the request of one of the members we inclose herewith our confidential circular, Premium Letter No. ——.

If it is your desire to avail yourselves of the premium proposition outlined therein, you will please date, sign, and return at once to this office the perforated slip attached to the letter. Should you decide not to enter the contract, please return the entire letter.

You are charged with this letter under its serial number and are requested to preserve it carefully, as under the rules of the association duplicate copies may not be sent to any dealer.

Yours, very truly,

THE POTTERY ASSOCIATION,
CHAS. E. MACRUM, Secretary.

Note the first paragraph: "At the request of one of the members"—that is, one of the 36 members of the association—"we inclose herewith our confidential circular, Premium Letter No. ——." The evident purpose of the association being to hold every dealer responsible for concealing from the public the plan under which this selling combination has been formed and is operated. Knowing that it would be within the power of such combination to absolutely ruin the jobber or wholesaler who would reveal the contents of this confidential premium circular and that the serial number would lead to the identification of the person who revealed this information, is no doubt the reason why these copies do not contain the serial number appearing upon the original.

Thus it will be seen that the individual merchant or wholesaler is deprived of that freedom in the making of his purchases and the transaction of his business that is so essential to the development of that self-reliance and aggressiveness without which the growth and development of the individual or the expansion of his business is impossible.

The confidential premium circular is as follows:

PREMIUM LETTER—THIS IS A CONTRACT. STUDY ITS CONDITIONS CAREFULLY.

EAST LIVERPOOL, OHIO, January 1, 1903.

GENTLEMEN: This is to advise you that the Pottery Association will pay, on certain conditions, a premium in cash on purchases of white and decorated semiporcelain, white granite, and C. C. dinner and toilet wares (not including packages, cash discounts, or other deductions) from any of its members.

The basis of premium to be paid will be fixed by the total or combined purchases during the year 1903 from any or all members of the association.

PREMIUM SCHEDULE.

On all purchases of premium wares, at the official prices, made from members of the association, contracted for after this date and shipped the year 1903 and paid for in accordance with the terms of sale, a premium in cash will be paid January 15, 1904, or as soon thereafter as accounts can be adjusted, according to the following schedule, viz:

On purchases of—	Per cent.	On purchases of—	Per cent.
1,000	3	13,000	15.1
2,000	5	14,000	15.2
3,000	7	15,000	15.3
4,000	9	16,000	15.4
5,000	11	17,000	15.5
6,000	12	18,000	15.6
7,000	12½	19,000	15.7
8,000	13	20,000	15.8
9,000	13½	21,000	15.9
10,000	14	22,000	16

For each additional $1,000 up to and including $32,000 add one-tenth of 1 per cent to the premium rate, which would make the rate on $32,000 17 per cent, and for each additional $1,000 over and above $32,000 add one-twentieth of 1 per cent to premium rate up to and including $52,000, upon which the rate will accordingly be 18 per cent and shall be the maximum premium offered.

Premiums may be paid at the end of the first six months of the year to any dealer to whom the premium is due on purchases of not less than $2,000, and such partial premium shall be calculated at the rates shown on the foregoing schedule. Any dealer desiring such partial premium must file his request with the treasurer within thirty days from July 1 with a statement of his purchases to that date.

The partial premium will be calculated as follows:

A dealer buys, January 1 to July 1, $3,000; premium due, 7 per cent on $3,000, $210. July 1 to January 1, $7,000; premium due, 14 per cent on $10,000, $1,400, less premium paid July 1, $210, $1,190. Year's purchase, $10,000. Total paid in two installments, $1,400.

Conditions are as follows:

Condition 1.—The amount of premium to be paid shall depend upon the total or combined purchases of premium ware from any or all members of the association.

Condition 2.—You shall have accepted and paid for all your purchases made from members of the association in conformity with their established prices and terms.

Condition 3.—Purchases of receipts of domestic premium ware (see condition 6) during the year 1903 must be confined to members of the Pottery Association, otherwise no premium will be paid.

Condition 4.—The right to revoke and cancel this proposition or any part thereof at any time is reserved, but obligations accrued hereunder up to the date of said revocation shall be paid.

Condition 5.—No combination of two or more dealers shall be permitted, under any circumstances, to unite purchases for the purpose of obtaining increased premiums.

Condition 6, premium ware.—Premiums will be paid on the following lines: Plain white semiporcelain dinner and toilet ware; plain white granite dinner and toilet ware; plain white C. C. dinner and toilet ware; decorated semiporcelain dinner and toilet ware; decorated white granite dinner and toilet ware; decorated C. C. dinner and toilet ware.

Nonpremium ware.—Decorated spittoons, jardinières, pedestals, umbrella stands, and other specialties not covered by above list are not subject to premium, nor shall purchases of such goods be included in estimating premium amounts of any dealer.

This proposition will not be binding upon this association unless it has your acceptance over your signature to the terms and conditions on the slip attached below.

Yours, very truly,

THE POTTERY ASSOCIATION,

THE POTTERY ASSOCIATION,
East Liverpool, Ohio.

GENTLEMEN: We have received your circular letter dated January 1, 1903. Its terms are acceptable, and we hereby agree to comply with the conditions named therein.

Yours, truly,

This is a very interesting document, and reveals a plan of organization for the purpose of creating an absolute monopoly in the manufacture and sale of an important product that is not only ingenious, but is proving very successful in the accomplishment of the purpose for which selling combinations are formed.

In the first place, as I am informed, this premium circular covers practically all classes of crockery or earthenware manufactured in the United States, and it is through the central association that these premiums are paid. It will be observed that the price at which the articles enumerated are sold is not determined by the cost of production, but is determined by the amount of the annual purchases. For example, on annual purchases aggregating $6,000, a premium or rebate of 12 per cent is allowed, while on annual purchases of $52,000 a premium or rebate of 18 per cent is repaid to the purchaser. Both of these wholesalers or jobbers may be engaged in selling these wares in the same territory, and in many instances they are. The man whose annual purchases aggregate only $6,000 pays 6 per cent more for the same goods than the man whose annual purchases aggregate $52,000, the difference in the premium returned or rebates allowed being 6 per cent.

But it is the conditions under which these premiums or rebates are paid that enable the association to compel dealers to buy all of their goods from the members of the association, and this gives to the association its monopoly. First, the amount of premium to be paid depends upon the total purchases of premium ware from any or all members of the association. Second, the purchaser must have accepted and paid for all his purchases according to their prices and terms. Third, purchases of premium ware during the year must be confined to members of the pottery association, "otherwise no premium will be paid." And then, in order that this arrangement may have the force and effect of a private contract, it is expressly stipulated that the proposition to pay these premiums shall not be binding upon the association unless it is accepted over the signature of the wholesaler, and the form of his acceptance is prescribed by the association and is absolutely unconditional. Therefore, the man who is engaged in the business of buying and selling crockery or earthenware must not only pay the price demanded by the association, including the premiums which are subsequently returned, thus depriving him of the benefit of the use of so much of the money as is represented by the premium for a period of six months, but he must also, in order to entitle him to a return of the premium or rebate at all, deal with no other manufacturer of crockery or earthenware, but deal exclusively with members of this pottery combination.

I am informed that among the 36 members of this association there are 3 corporations or manufacturers that manufacture a style and quality of earthenware or crockery that is not manufactured by any other company or manufacturer in the United States. The product of these three factories is one of the staple articles in this line of business, and therefore every dealer in the United States is compelled to buy this class of goods from one of these three members of the association and must either pay the price demanded, with the premium added, or make all of his purchases from members of this association. By reason of the fact, therefore, that there are members of this association manufacturing a class of goods that can not be obtained outside of the association this combination virtually compels every dealer to buy exclusively from members of the association or go out of business.

To my mind, Mr. Chairman, a combination of this kind is far more injurious, more iniquitous, than any other class of combinations we have to deal with. They entirely eliminate the element of competition in trade; and it is only by preserving the law of free and open competition in productive industry that the progress and development of the nation can be insured and the extension of our foreign trade maintained.

But, Mr. Chairman, while the destruction of competition, the control of prices, and the centralization of productive industry will, if not checked, lead to consequences disastrous to the people, yet the most serious result is the menace involved to the future welfare and happiness of the individual citizen, and to that extent a menace to the nation.

I am aware that in the debate upon this bill it has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], and by other gentlemen who are inclined to take an optimistic view of the present industrial consolidation, that the day of the individual is passed, and that he can not hereafter hope to enjoy the opportunity heretofore enjoyed. To my mind, Mr. Chairman, there is nothing more essential to the welfare and happiness of the nation, to its growth and progress, than the preservation of individual opportunity in commerce, trade, and in all lines of productive industry. The boy in the country grocery, by his own effort and the opportunities for the development of shrewd business sagacity, has become the wholesale merchant of the large city and the enterprising, public-spirited business man of the nation.

In his early business career he had the opportunity to go into the open market and there choose his wares from a hundred or more producers. He was then at liberty and entirely free to sell them at his own price, subject only to the will of his competitors. He was always entirely free in making his purchases and in transacting his business. It was this that made him self-reliant, aggressive, and successful; but when the production and sale of almost every article of merchandise is controlled by gigantic corporations, commonly called "trusts," or by numerous independent corporations operating under a selling combination, such as the Pottery Association, and the glass manufacturers who say to the merchant, "You can have our goods if you pay our price and agree to purchase only from us," or, as in some instances, "also agree to sell to your customers at a price fixed by us."

What then becomes of the individual opportunities that have heretofore made our successful merchants, our intelligent, enterprising citizens, and developed the moral and material resources of the nation? Or, when through the selfish greed of managers or the avaricious demands of the holders of watered stock a further step in this industrial reorganization is taken and these consolidated industries, like the Standard Oil trust, the tobacco trust, and many others adopt the policy of dealing directly with the people through established agencies, what then will become not alone of these opportunities for individual effort, but what will become of that intelligent, enterprising class of citizens known as the middlemen? Instead of having an incentive and an opportunity to strive for the control of business or ownership of property and the betterment of his condition in life he will be forced into the ranks of the "hewers of wood and drawers of water," there to become a mere consumer, and the nation loses a progressive, energetic producer.

Mr. Chairman, individual opportunity is the necessary condition of free labor, the parent of industrial progress. The opportunity for individual effort and the attainment of every laudable ambition, in competition with our fellows, is the priceless open secret of American democracy. It has made us in little more than a century the most aggressive of the foremost nations of the world. It has forced into activity the resistless energies of our people. It has made possible for the individual the realization of his highest capacities as a citizen. Let us not, therefore, discourage the young men of to-day by announcing upon this floor that the opportunity for their development and their success in business, in trade, commerce, or industry by their own individual effort is a thing of the past, and that they must hereafter depend alone for their success upon the favor of corporate enterprises or the influence of officers or stockholders of gigantic corporations. Let us not abandon all effort or hope in this age of industrial consolidation of preserving to the citizen that opportunity for individual effort the existence of which in the past has blessed our homes with happiness and given to our social and industrial fabric a moral and an intellectual significance which is the pride of America and the envy of the world. [Applause].

APPENDIX.

[By Joseph R. Edson, of the bar of the Supreme Court of the United States, No. 927 F street NW., Washington, D. C.]

Should Congress provide, by general legislation, for the extension of letters patent, in proper cases, beyond the term of the original grant.

This subject will be considered under the following heads:

1. Constitutional provision for patent laws.
2. Laws enacted between 1790 and 1836, and between 1836 and 1902.
3. Law of 1836, providing for extension of patents, and law of 1861, repealing same.
4. How passage of repealing act was secured.
5. Some general law similar to the law of 1836 should be reenacted.
6. Extensions should be granted when inventions have not been placed on the market, or inventors have not been suitably rewarded.
7. On grounds of public policy, and to carry out in good faith the contract between Government and inventor, the inventor should be granted, in proper cases, an extension of his patent.
8. Debt of Government to its inventors.
9. Industrial progress of government, measured by the protection and encouragement government gives to its inventors.
10. America's commercial supremacy and high wages founded on patents.
11. No limit to human invention.
12. "It requires no prophet's vision to see the coming glory and the coming triumph of the inventive skill of man."
13. To inventors we must look for maintenance of high wages over cheap foreign labor.

OPINION OF STATESMEN, POETS, AND AUTHORS ON INFLUENCE OF INVENTION UPON CIVILIZATION.

"Our future progress and prosperity depend upon our ability to equal, if not surpass, other nations in the enlargement and advance of science, industry, and commerce. To invention we must turn as one of the most powerful aids in the accomplishment of such a result.

"May not inventors look to the Fifty-sixth Congress for aid and effectual encouragement in improving the American patent system?"—President McKinley in his annual message of December 5, 1899.

"The class of men who have given to their native land and to the world these grand inventions, whose beneficent influences tell with measureless power upon every pulsation of our domestic, social, and commercial life, are indeed public benefactors, and may well be pardoned for believing that their wants should not be treated with entire indifference by that body which represents alike the intellect and heart, as it does the material interests of the great country of which they are citizens—the Congress of the United States."—Commissioner of Patents Holt.

"From the earliest history of patent law the fact has been recognized that the inventor may, from circumstances not within his control, fail to obtain an adequate recompense for his inventive skill during the original term of his patent, and that justice to him and a due regard to the public interest, may thus sometimes require an extension of his monopoly in the invention."—Robinson on Patents.

"Th' invention all admired, and each how he to be the inventor missed;
so easy it seemed,
Once found, which, yet unfound, most would have thought impossible."
—Milton.

"Is it reasonable to make a man feel as if, in inventing an ingenious improvement meant to do good, he has done something wrong? How else can a man feel after he is met with difficulties at every turn? * * * And look at the expense, how hard on me, and how hard on the country, if there is any merit in me (and my invention is took up now, I am thankful to say, and doing well), to put me to all that expense."—Dickens.

"I think that we have all of us reason to feel satisfied with the showing made in this exposition, as in the great expositions of the past, of the results of the enterprise, the shrewd daring, the business energy and capacity, and the artistic and, above all, the wonderful mechanical skill and inventiveness of our people. Modern industrial competition is very keen between nation and nation, and now that our country is striding forward with the pace of a giant to take the leading position of the international industrial world, we should beware how we fetter our limbs. * * * We need the finest abilities of the statesman, the student, the patriot, and the far-seeing lover of mankind. They have shown the qualities of daring, endurance, and far-sightedness, of eager desire for victory and stubborn refusal to accept defeat."—President Roosevelt at Pan-American Exposition on "The Two Americas," Buffalo, May 20, and at Minnesota State Fair, on "National Duties," September 2, 1901.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION FOR PATENT LAWS.

On the 17th day of September, 1787, the American people, through their chosen representatives in the Constitutional Convention, gave their consent to that clause of the Constitution which confers upon Congress the power "to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing, for limited times, to authors and inventors, the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries."

Later on in this paper I will consider in what manner and to what extent the laws passed by Congress were designed to secure to inventors the exclusive right to their discoveries; also what further legislation, if any, is needed to give the security and the exclusive enjoyment contemplated by the fathers, as expressed in the Constitution, and by Congress in the enactment of patent laws.

Following the adoption of the Constitution and the recommendation of President Washington, in his first annual message to Congress, to give "effectual encouragement to the introduction of new and useful inventions," and "to the exertions of skill and genius in producing them," Congress passed "An act to promote the progress of useful arts," which became a law, by approval of President Washington, on April 10, 1790. This first patent law was followed by other acts of 1793, 1794, 1800, 1819, 1832—two acts—1836, 1837, 1839, 1842, 1848, 1849, 1852, 1861—two acts—1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, 1867, 1870, 1871, 1887, 1897, 1898, 1899, and 1902.

It will thus be seen that under the authority conferred upon Congress by section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution, no less than twenty-eight laws have been passed by Congress to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing, for limited times, to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.

To enable inventors and their assignees, manufacturers of patented improvements, and others interested in patents to appreciate how willing Congress has always been to do all that it could to give effect to the constitutional provision to promote the progress of the useful arts by passing laws from time to time to encourage inventors and to give them security, I have prepared the following digest of the patent laws that have been passed by Congress from the date of the adoption of the Constitution down to 1902. An examination of this digest shows the frequency of legislation by Congress to add improvements to our patent system and thereby encourage inventors to give their time, labor, skill, and means in order to "promote the progress of science and useful arts," and to advance the comfort and happiness of mankind.

Judging Congress by its past legislation are we not forced to believe that its failure to act favorably on private bills for the relief of particular inventors affords no evidence whatever that it would oppose the enactment of a general law governing the extension of patents?

LAWS ENACTED BETWEEN 1790 AND 1836 AND BETWEEN 1836 AND 1902.

The act of 1793 provided for arbitration in interference cases, for the repeal of patents surreptitiously obtained.

The act of 1794 restored all suits brought under the act of 1790.

The act of 1800 extended the rights under our patent law to certain aliens; provided that the right to a patent by a deceased inventor shall devolve on his legal representatives; that in a suit for infringement for any patent the patentee or assignee might recover damages "equal to three times the damages actually sustained."

The act of 1819 conferred jurisdiction upon the circuit courts of the United States, as well in equity as at law, in all suits, etc., arising under any patent law, and also provided for a writ of error or appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The first act of 1832, section 2, related to applications to Congress for the extension of letters patent; section 3 provided for the issuance of a new patent (reissue) in case a patent is "invalid" or "inoperative" through "inadvertence," accident, or mistake, and "without any fraudulent or deceptive intention * * * of the inventor."

The second act of 1832 extended certain privileges under our patent laws to certain aliens who had declared their intention to become citizens of the United States.

The act of 1837 provided in sections 1 to 5 for the filing in the Patent Office of copies of patents, etc., the Patent Office having been destroyed by fire on December 15, 1836; section 6 enacted that upon authority of the inventor, the Commissioner may in any case issue a patent to the assignee; section 7 enacted that whenever a patentee shall have, through inadvertence, accident, or mistake, made his specification too broad he may make disclaimer of such parts of the thing patented, and such disclaimer shall thereafter be taken and considered as part of the original specification; section 8 enacted that an improvement may be added to a reissue application, and that such applications shall be subject to revision and restriction; section 9 enacted that a patent shall be good and valid in part, provided the patentee was the inventor of a "material and substantial part of the thing," but in case of suit he shall not recover costs if he unreasonably neglected to enter a disclaimer; section 14 enacted that the Commissioner shall make an annual report to Congress in January of each year of the number of patents issued, etc., "together with such other information of the condition of the Patent Office as may be useful to Congress or the public." It will be noted that the Commissioner of Patents is the only bureau officer under the Government that has received the distinction of being called upon to make a direct report to Congress.

The act of 1839, in addition to increasing the force of the Patent Office, provided for the publication of a list of patents granted; that (see sec. 8) no charge should be made for recording an assignment, thereby repealing section 2 of the act of 1836, which imposed a recording fee of $3.

The act of 1842, section 3, enacted that patents for designs should be issued; section 4, that the oath may be taken in any foreign country; section 5, that falsely marking an article with word "patent" or "patentee" or any word or words with intent to counterfeit the stamp or mark of a patentee and of deceiving the public, shall be liable to a fine of not less than $100. Section 6 required the patentee to properly mark the patented improvements, etc.

The act of 1848 enacted that the power to extend patents "shall hereafter be invested solely in the Commissioner of Patents," thereby relieving the Secretary of State and the Solicitor of the Treasury of hearing, etc., the applications for extensions; section 4 authorized the Commissioner of Patents to send the annual reports of the Patent Office by mail free of charge.

The act of 1849 enacted "that the Secretary of the Interior shall exercise and perform all the acts of supervision and appeal in regard to the office of the Commissioner of Patents now exercised by the Secretary of State."

The act of 1852 enacted that appeals from the Commissioner of Patents may be made to either of the assistant judges, as well as the chief judge of the circuit court of the District of Columbia.

The act of 1863, 12 Statutes at Large, 796, section 1, repealed so much of section 7, act of 1836, as required an applicant to file a new oath; section 3 gave the applicant six months within which to pay the final fee, and provided that as to cases that had been allowed, the six months should be reckoned from the date of this act.

The act of 1864 provided that the final fees might be paid within six months after the date of forfeiture of an allowed application for nonpayment of final fee.

The act of 1865, 12 Statutes at Large, 553, provided that a new application might be filed within two years after the date of allowance of a forfeited application.

The act of 1870, 16 Statutes at Large, 198, section 10, provided that the examiners in chief should "hear, when required by the Commissioner, and report upon claims for extension;" section 25, that prior patents in a foreign country shall not debar issuance of patent here; provided the invention has not been in public use in this country for more than two years; section 53 provided that, upon the reissue of a patent, the Commissioner might issue "several patents for distinct and separate parts of the thing patented;" section 55 provided "that all actions shall be brought during the term for which the letters patent shall be granted or extended, or within six years after the expiration thereof;" sections 63, 64, 65, 66, and 67 are substantially the same as section 18 of the act of 1836, with this addition: That upon publication of notice of an application for extension, the Commissioner shall refer the case to the principal examiner having charge of the class of inventions to which it belongs, who shall make to said Commissioner a full report of the case, and particularly whether the invention or discovery was new or patentable when the original patent was granted."

The act of 1871, 16 Statutes at Large, 585, provided that the acts of 1870 should not apply to applications for reissue that were filed before the date of said act, July 8, 1870.

There was practically no legislation relating to mechanical patents from 1871 to 1897. The act of 1874 related to copyrights, the act of 1887 to designs, and the act of 1891 to copyrights.

THE ACT OF MARCH 3, 1897.

Section 25 of the act of July 8, 1870, declared that an American patent should "not be declared invalid by reason of the invention having been first patented in a foreign country, unless the same had been introduced into public use in the United States for more than two years prior to the application."

This act of March 3, 1897, amended sections 4886, 4887, 4894, 4898, 4920, and 4921 of the Revised Statutes.

There were two amendments to section 4886, one of which enlarged the rights of the inventor by enabling him to go back to the date of his invention or discovery in support of his patent, while the other amendment rendered a patent invalid if the invention had been patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country before his invention or discovery thereof "for more than two years prior to his application." Before the addition of the second amendment to section 4886, evidence that the invention had been patented or described in a printed publication in a foreign country for "more than two years prior to his application" would not defeat the patent unless the invention had been "in public use or sale in this country for more than two years prior to his application."

Section 4887: This section, as amended, amended section 4921 by adding thereto the following sentence:

"But in any suit or action brought for the infringement of any patent, there shall be no recovery of profits or damages for any infringement committed more than six years before the filing of the bill of complaint or the issuing of the writ in such suit or action, and this provision shall apply to existing causes of action."

An act entitled "An act defining the jurisdiction of the United States circuit courts in cases brought for the infringement of letters patent," approved March 3, 1897, provides that in case "suit is brought in a district of which the defendant is not an inhabitant, but in which said defendant has a regular and established place of business, service of process, summons, or subpœna upon the defendant may be made by issuance upon the agent or agents engaged in conducting such business in the district in which suit is brought."

An act of February 28, 1899, amended section 4896 by providing that "when any person having made any new invention or discovery for which a patent might have been granted becomes insane before a patent is granted, the right of applying for and obtaining the patent shall devolve upon his legally appointed guardian, conservator, or representative in trust for his estate."

Another act, approved March 3, 1898, entitled "An act to authorize the Supreme Court of the United States to issue writs of certiorari to the court of appeals in the District of Columbia in the same cases and manner that it may do in respect to the circuit court of appeals."

And the act entitled "An act to amend section 4929 of the Revised Statutes relating to design patents," constitute, with the acts previously mentioned, all the acts of Congress relating to patents for inventions, except two or three acts of minor importance, e. g., as an act approved April 11, 1902, amending section 4883, Revised Statutes, by providing that patents shall be signed by the Commissioner of Patents instead of by that officer and the Secretary of the Interior.

LAW OF 1836, PROVIDING FOR EXTENSION OF PATENTS, AND LAW OF 1861 REPEALING SAME.

The act of 1836, section 1, established the Patent Office;

Section 2 provided for the appointment of officers and employees of the Patent Office; also that every employee of said office, including the Commissioner of said office "shall be disqualified * * * from acquiring * * * except by inheritance * * * any right or interest, directly or indirectly, in any patent for an invention or discovery which has been or may hereafter be granted:"

Section 3: That certain officers should give bonds, and certain employees should make oath, for faithful performance of their duties;

Section 4: That certified copies might be used in evidence;

Section 5 gave the inventor, his assigns, etc., the full and exclusive right and liberty of making, using, and vending to others to be used * * * what the patentee claims as his invention or discovery;

Section 6 described who might apply for a patent and what the application should contain;

Section 7 provided that upon filing of an application the Commissioner should "make or cause to be made an examination of the alleged new invention or discovery; and if, on any such examination, it shall not appear to the Commissioner that the same had been invented or discovered by any other person in this country prior to the alleged invention or discovery thereof by the applicant thereof, or that it had been patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country, or had been in public use or on sale with applicant's consent or allowance prior to his application, if the Commissioner shall deem it sufficiently useful and important, it shall be his duty to issue a patent therefor;" that in case of rejection of his application, the applicant might withdraw his application, receiving back part of the fee therefor, or appeal to a board of examiners and that, on such an appeal, a majority of the board, consisting of three persons, might reverse the decision of the Commissioner;

Section 8 provided for an appeal in interference cases;

Sections 9 and 10 established certain Government fees and provided that the legal representative of a deceased inventor might apply for a patent; and provided that every patent should be assignable, either as to the whole interest, or any undivided part thereof;

Section 12 provided for the filing of caveats in case the inventor desired "further time to mature" his invention, and gave the inventor "protection of his right till he shall have matured his invention;"

Section 13 provided for the reissue of patents and for the addition to the reissue "of any new improvement of the original invention or discovery which shall have been invented or discovered by him subsequent to the date of his patent, * * * and have the same annexed to the original description and specification;"

Section 14 gave the court power, in a suit for infringement, to give judgment for the plaintiff for an amount "not exceeding three times the amount" named in a "verdict as the actual damages sustained by the plaintiff;"

Section 15 provided that foreign use should not invalidate a patent, and that, "if it shall appear that the defendant had used or violated any part of the invention justly and truly specified and claimed as new, it shall be in the power of the court to adjudge and award as to costs, as may appear to be just and equitable;"

Section 16 provided for the determination by a bill in equity "of the fact of priority of right of invention" between interfering patents, or between a patent and an application for a patent;

Section 18 provided: "And be it further enacted, That whenever any patentee of an invention or discovery shall desire an extension of a patent beyond the term of its limitation, he may make application therefor in writing, to the Commissioner of Patents setting forth the grounds thereof; and the Commissioner shall, on the applicant's paying the sum of $40 to the credit of the Treasury as in the case of an original application for a patent, cause to be published in one or more principal newspapers in the city of Washington and in such other paper or papers as he may deem proper, published in the section of the country most interested adversely to the extension of the patent, a notice of such application, and of the time and place when and where the same will be considered, that any person may appear and show cause why the extension should not be granted. And the Secretary of State, the Commissioner of the Patent Office, and the Solicitor of the Treasury shall constitute a board to hear and decide upon the evidence produced before them, both for and against the extension, and shall sit for that purpose at the time and place designated in the published notice thereof. The patentee shall furnish the said board a statement in writing, under oath, of the ascertained value of the invention, and of his receipts and expenditures sufficiently in detail to exhibit a true and faithful account of loss and profit in any manner accruing to him from and by reason of the said invention. And if, upon hearing of the matter, it shall appear to the full and entire satisfaction of the said board, having due regard to the public interests therein that it is just and proper that the term of the patent should be extended, by reason of the patentee, without neglect or fault on his part, having failed to obtain from the use and sale of his invention a reasonable remuneration for the time, ingenuity, and expense bestowed upon the same, and the introduction thereof into use, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner to renew and extend the patent by making a certificate thereon of such extension, for the term of seven years from and after the expiration of the first term; which certificate, with a certificate of said board of their judgment as aforesaid, shall be entered on record in the Patent Office; and thereupon the said patent shall have the same effect in law as though it had been originally granted for the term of twenty-one years; and the benefit of such renewal shall extend to assignees and grantees of the right to use the thing patented to the extent of their respective interests therein: Provided, however, That no extension of a patent shall be granted after the expiration of the term for which it was originally issued."

Section 19 enacted that the "Committee of the Library of Congress should provide the Patent Office with a library of scientific works and periodical publications, both foreign and American, calculated to facilitate the discharge of the duties hereby required of the chief officers" of said office; section 20 enacted that the models, etc., deposited in the office, patented or unpatented, shall be classified and arranged in rooms or galleries in such manner as will be conducive to a favorable display thereof, and that said rooms or galleries shall be kept open for public inspection.

The act of 1861, approved February 18, provided that a writ of error or appeal shall lie, as the case may be, to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The act of 1861, approved March 2, 1861, 12 Statutes at Large, 246, section 1, provided for the making of rules for taking depositions in interference cases and required the United States courts to issue subpœnas for witnesses in such cases; section 2 provided for the appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of three examiners in chief to hear appeals from principal examiners, etc., and, when required by the Commissioner of Patents, to hear and report upon applications for extensions of patents; section 3 gave an applicant the right to two rejections of his application before he should be put to the expense of an appeal; section 4 increased the salaries of certain officials of the Patent Office; section 5 authorized the Commissioner to restore to applicants the models in a certain class of cases; section 7 authorized the Commissioner to appoint "such an additional number of principal examiners, first assistant examiners, and second assistant examiners as may be required, that * * * the total annual expense of the Patent Office shall not exceed the annual receipts;" section 10 fixed the fees to be paid to the Patent Office, including $50 on every application for an extension and $50 on the granting of every extension; section 11 provided that designs might be extended for seven years; section 13 provided that patented improvements should be marked; and section 16 enacted "that all patents hereafter granted shall remain in force for the term of seventeen years from the date of issue, and all extension of such patents is hereby prohibited."

HOW PASSAGE OF REPEALING ACT WAS SECURED—SOME GENERAL LAW SIMILAR TO THE LAW OF 1836 SHOULD BE REENACTED—INVENTORS ENTITLED TO REWARD.

The consideration of Congressional legislation since the adoption of the Constitution is an unanswerable argument to the objection that Congress is opposed to the inventor and to all that his encouragement means to the nation and is hostile to such further legislation as would give him additional opportunity to secure reward for his invention, by providing the machinery for hearing applications for the extension of letters patent, in cases wherein the inventor, through no fault of his own, has not been rewarded for his invention. Probably nine-tenths of the inventors and others interested in patents, such as assignees, manufacturers, etc., as well as the great body of the legal profession, including those who are known as specialists in patent law and practice, have, without just cause, formed the opinion that Congress is hostile to any general legislation having in view the passage of a law similar to section 18 of the law of 1836, providing for the granting, in proper cases, of extensions of letters patent. This opinion may be founded, although unjustly, upon the fact that since March 2, 1875, only four patents have been extended. As I shall hereinafter show, the fact that only a small number of patents has been extended since 1875 is not due to Congressional hostility to inventors, who were never in greater favor with Congress, with the American people, and with the entire civilized world than they are now, but is due to the way—the means—namely, private bills for relief, which has been adopted to secure an extended term.

Until the writer prepared and had caused to be introduced at the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress two bills (S. No. 6313 and 6314 and H. R. 15332 and 15333) to provide by general legislation for the reenactment of a law lor the granting, in proper cases, of applications for extensions, instead of depending upon the passage of private relief bills, no bill, in the form of a general law, had been introduced in Congress since the passage of the act of 1861, much less been refused favorable consideration by Congress, to restore a general law for the extension of patents.

I shall hereinafter show how and in what manner the law for the extension of patents was repealed; that the repeal was advanced as a mere experiment; that as an experiment it has proved to be unjust to inventors and others, against public policy, a breach of public faith on the part of the Government, and, lastly, an admitted failure.

I shall also endeavor to show that in view of the many technical questions of law and fact which arise in the considerations of applications for extensions, and the frequent changes that take place in the membership of the Senate and House Committees on Patents, especially of the House committee, and of the time that necessarily would be required to hear the applications, examine the proofs, consider authorities, and prepare decisions, it would be a physical impossibility for the committees of Congress to render the service required of them to properly hear the applications which would be filed if they "let down the bars" by making a few favorable reports on private bills to grant extensions outright by Congress, or even refer the applications to the Commissioner of Patents for hearing and determination.

To indicate the changes which take place on the House committee, I will state that eight of the present members thereof have not been reelected, hence, even if the remaining five members were all reappointed, there would necessarily be a large majority of new members on the next committee.

The unreasonableness of expecting a committee, whose membership is subject to such large and frequent changes from one Congress to another, to take up and consider several hundred applications for extensions each year, the proper disposition of which in justice to the public, as well as to the applicants, would require special knowledge of a difficult branch of the law and a technical knowledge in nearly every art, is so apparent that it has only to be stated to secure a prompt admission. Remember, also, that the committees, especially of the House, can only meet, at best, once or twice a week for an hour or so, during a period of less than three months every other year, namely, the second session of each Congress. Think of such a committee, so limited in time, undertaking to hear several hundred applications for extension, an enterprise impossible, even if they had no public duties to perform and never so much as attended a single session of the House. Against the babel of voices and the flood of papers, so vastly beyond their physical powers to hear or examine, they can only protect themselves as you or I, if we were in their places, would protect ourselves, either by rejecting applications or by neglecting to make favorable reports thereon to the House. Therefore, the only relief must necessarily come through some general law similar in effect to section 18 of the act of 1836, providing proper machinery for the consideration of applications for extension.

At a recent hearing of a private bill before the Senate committee for the extension of a patent which was about to expire, leaving the inventor without any reward for his invention, in the development of which he had spent nearly thirty of the best years of his life, and had expended all he was worth when he began, all he had made during the said thirty years, and all that he had been able to borrow from friends and business acquaintances who had confidence in him personally and in his genius as an inventor, and had, nevertheless, not been able to place his improvement upon the market, although he now had the promise of capital to do so, in view of the recent demonstrations of the practical utility of his improvement, a Senator asked the writer if he knew of any possible objection to favorable action upon the case other than that it would form a precedent to encourage others (equally meritorious) to make similar applications. I mention this incident merely to show that the adverse action of the committees of Congress on applications for extensions is not due to their hostility either toward inventors or to a revival of one of the salient features of the American patent system, namely, extensions of patents in proper cases, but is due to the well-grounded belief that if they encourage applications for extensions by making favorable reports on private bills, it would, in a very short time, be a physical impossibility to hear the number of applications that would be made.

While pressing for a favorable action of the House Committee on Patents on a private bill for the relief of a client whom I was serving (see his letter below), practically without charge, in consideration of his being one of my old clients, who had impoverished himself in efforts to induce capitalists to promote his patent, and having frequently expressed my surprise at not receiving notice of a favorable action, a member of the committee finally said to me, "Mr. Edson, you have a good case and your client is justly entitled to have his bill favorably considered; but the fact of the matter is there are plenty of other cases just as meritorious as yours, and if we should act favorably upon your case, it would be a precedent for others to follow and we would soon have more applications than we could possibly consider." To which I replied, "Well, if that is the reason why extensions of patents can not be secured, either by direct act of Congress, or by favorable action on private bills referring cases to the Commissioner of Patents for hearing, that objection can be readily overcome by the passage of a general law which will relieve the committees of Congress from labor which, I frankly concede, they can not perform with due regard to other public duties."

As soon as this statement was made to me, and especially after a member of the Senate committee had asked me, "Do you know of any objection to favorable action on the Jenkins case other than that it would make a precedent upon which to claim favorable action on other applications, etc.?" I became fully satisfied that the obstacle to obtaining extension of patents was in the mode of procedure—private bills—and not in the relief sought, and that therefore some general law should be passed which would give some court, board, or commission jurisdiction of the hearing and determination of applications for extensions, and I accordingly prepared and secured the introduction of the two bills as heretofore stated.

BURTON HOTEL, 310 C STREET NW.,
Washington, D. C., June , 1902.

Mr. JOSEPH R. EDSON, Care Edson Brothers, 927 F street NW., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I sincerely thank you for the labor and the great kindness you have shown to me in preparing and helping me to present my case, and in view of the fact that I was unable to give you a fee that would have been considered reasonable for your labor, I feel all the more grateful to you for the kindness and valuable services rendered and the interest you have taken in my case, * * * and that you may continue to follow up the good work. I close by assuring you that you have my very best wishes and can believe me, as ever,

Yours, most sincerely, SAMUEL H. JENKINS.

P. S.—After this week my address will be, as formerly, Chattanooga, Tenn.

Mr. Jenkins's private bill failed to receive favorable consideration, thus having met the fate of all such bills that have been filed within the last fifteen years.

The act March 2, 1861, known as Senate bill No. 10, repealed section 5 of the act of 1836, which fixed the term of a patent as fourteen years, and section 18 of the same act, which provided for an extension of the original term for a period of seven years. As this bill finally passed the Senate it contained no provision for either extending the term of a patent or for repealing or modifying section 18 of the act of 1836 relating to the extension of patents. The House amended the bill as it came from the Senate by adding a section which read as follows:

Par. 16. "And be it further enacted, That there shall be no further extension of any patent when it shall appear to the Commissioner that the profits of said patent, including sales made by the assignee or assignees of said invention, shall amount to one hundred thousand dollars."

The Senate disagreed to the House amendment, as to assignees, on the ground, inter alia, that the assignees might be unable or unwilling to give an accounting, and that the inventor could not compel them to do so. The Senate having disagreed to the amendment of the House, and the House and Senate having "insisted," the bill went to a conference committee, up to which time it had not contained any provision either to change the duration of patents or to repeal the law providing for their extension. The conference committee struck out the entire section, and substituted the short one, which stands as section 16 of the act, namely:

"That all patents hereafter granted shall remain in force for the term of seventeen years from the date of issue; and all extension of such patents is hereby prohibited."

This bill also provided for the taking of depositions in interference cases, which had been repeatedly urged upon Congress by the Commissioner of Patents; for the appointment of three examiners in chief, at an annual salary of $3,000 each; for an increase in the salary of the Commissioner of Patents and other employees of the Patent Office; for the appointment by the Commissioner of "such an additional number of principal examiners, first assistant examiners, and second assistant examiners as may be required to transact the current business of the office with dispatch, provided that the total expenses of the Patent Office shall not exceed the annual receipts," etc., the bill containing seventeen sections in all.

The failure of either the Senate or the House to adopt the report of the conference committee meant, of course, the failure of the entire bill, as will be understood by those who are familiar with legislative procedure. There was no discussion in either House upon the substitute section 16, prepared by the conference committee, repealing the law providing for the extension of patents, and I have been unable to find anything in the archives of Congress or of the Patent Office which shows that the Commissioner of Patents, or anyone else, had ever so much as suggested such an amendment to the law.

This repeal of one of the salient features of the American patent system (section 18 of the act of 1836) was accomplished without, so far as I can learn, a single objection to the old law by any American citizen, official or unofficial, lay or professional, natural or artificial, or the presentation of a single recommendation or petition therefor.

Here was a bill which entirely reorganized the Patent Office (see digest herein, act of 1836, sections 2 to 19) that had been twice considered by each House of Congress and then came for consideration before the two Houses upon the report of a conference committee, at a time when the President elect, Abraham Lincoln, was nearing Washington to be inaugurated, when the nation was stirred to its very center and in the throes of a great civil war. At such a moment the report of this conference committee came before the two Houses of Congress for action. In view of the many very meritorious provisions of the bill it would be unreasonable to expect the friends of the bill to allow it to fail through adverse action by either House of Congress upon the report of the conference committee. But the mistake, "the step in the wrong direction," that was made in practically cutting off extensions, has become more and more apparent since the seventeen-year patents began to expire in 1878.

The Commissioner of Patents, Hon. M. D. Leggett, in his report to Congress for the year 1872 (see O. G., vol. 3, page 62), said:

"Until March 2, 1861, patents were granted for the term of fourteen years, with the right of extension when proper cause was shown. Said act provided that the term shall be for seventeen years, with no right of extension. I have always doubted the wisdom of the law, and the more thoroughly I have become acquainted with inventors and their peculiarities the more thoroughly I am convinced that the change was an unwise one. It is a fact familiar to all who have given the subject-matter any considerable attention that a very large proportion of the more valuable inventions are assigned in their infancy for trifling considerations, because of the indigent circumstances of the patentee. Assignees have in general made all the money that has been made from the original term of patents.

"There is justice in giving a considerable proportion of the profits arising from patents to assignees; for generally the talent required to create the demand for and to manufacture and to successfully introduce into public use the thing invented is as valuable and meritorious as that exercised by the inventor. That assignees of patents have made large profits is not therefore of itself an objection to the law; but the design of the patent laws, under the provisions of the Constitution, was to encourage and develop invention by giving to inventors a monopoly that might compensate them. Experience has developed the fact that a very large proportion of our most worthy and deserving inventors have been obliged to look to the extended terms of their patents for their remuneration. When the invention is made it is often in advance of the demand for it. The public must be educated up to its wants, requiring considerable time and expense before the inventor can be remunerated. It is in this stage of the life of a patent that inventors are often compelled by poverty to sell their inventions for a very small sum. When the patent is extended, the extended term belonging to the inventor, and the public now understanding its value, the inventor is enabled to obtain a reasonable compensation for his patent. In this way the extended term becomes far more remunerative than the original.

"As mere mechanics and copyists our people are greatly excelled by the older nations, but in useful and labor-saving inventions the people of the United States excel all others. It is difficult to overestimate the extent to which our country is indebted to the genius and industry of our inventors. No other nation has done so much to secure to its inventors the results of their brains and labor. In no other country have the legislators and the courts been so liberal and just in affording protection to the peculiar class of property covered by patents for invention. The rich development of valuable inventions which have so distinguished our country is largely due to our recognition of the just rights of inventors.

"The act of March 2, 1861, I am fully convinced, was legislation in the wrong direction, and that the encouragement of useful inventions, as well as justice to the inventors, requires a right in the inventor to secure extension in meritorious cases."

The official records of the Patent Office show that only four patents have been extended since March 2, 1875, the date of expiration of the last issue of fourteen-year patents.

The supposition so generally, though erroneously and unjustly, entertained that Congress is opposed to the extension of patents, affords an explanation of the reduction of the number of private bills that have been filed to secure the extension of patents, either by the direct act of Congress or through the Patent Office.

I am satisfied that the commonly expressed opinion as to the attitude of Congress on the question of extensions of patents is founded upon suppositions and not upon facts; and so well satisfied have I become that a large majority of Congress are not opposed to the granting of extensions, in proper cases, and that it has accepted the act of March 2, 1861, as conclusive and final as to the extension of patents only because it would be impossible for the committees of Congress to hear, examine, and pass upon the large number of applications that would be filed every year if they should make favorable reports upon a very limited number of applications, that I am convinced that success would crown an effort made to secure general legislation which would provide for hearing and determination of applications for extension by some board, commission, or court. I have, accordingly, prepared four bills, two of which have already been introduced in the Senate and House, read twice, and referred to the proper committees. One bill (Senate No. 6314, House No. 15333), to state its contents briefly, practically restores the old law of 1836, except that it provides for an extension for a term not to exceed seventeen years. If an inventor who, for example, after having made and patented an important invention, has never enjoyed the "exclusive" right to make and use his invention, but has been forced to spend all of his income from his patent, and, perhaps, drawn upon his other resources, to pay expenses of litigations which have continued almost to the date of expiration of his patent, justice, fairness, and good faith on the part of the Government demand that the patent shall be extended for a term which will give the patentee the period of "exclusive" right which the Government, under its contract (see Supreme Court in Grant v. Raymond, 6 Peters, 218) agreed to secure to him in consideration of his making a full disclosure of his invention.

The second bill, Senate No. 6313, House No. 15332, provides that the Commissioner of Patents shall have the usual examinations made as to the prior state of the art to see whether all the claims of the patent were properly allowed.

Shall select the publications in which notice of the application for extension shall be inserted in order to give notice to adverse interests. After the proceedings above indicated the case is to be sent to the Court of Claims for examination and decision upon all the proofs and argument of counsel.

The third bill provides for the establishment of a commission to be attached to the Patent Office and paid out of the "patent fund," which shall separately, or in connection with the Commissioner, perform all duties and have exclusive jurisdiction over all applications for extension.

The fourth bill contemplates the filing of a private bill in each case, as at present, and the establishment of a commission to hear each case and report its findings of fact to Congress with a recommendation that the bill be favorably or unfavorably considered; also that no patent extended under the provisions of this act shall be construed to give any right to sue the Government of the United States for the infringement of the patent under its extended term.

The writer has received many assurances from members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives that a move to "secure general legislation," as proposed in these bills, is in the "right direction."

The following is a copy of one of the said four bills, two of which were introduced in the Senate by Senator BATE June 30, 1902, Senate Nos. 6313 and 6314; and which were also introduced in the House of Representatives by Judge MOON on July 1, 1902.

A bill to amend sections 4924 and 4927 of the Revised Statutes, relating to patents.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 4924 be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4924. That where the patentee of any invention or discovery, the patent for which was granted within seventeen years and nine months preceding the date of the passage of this act, shall desire an extension of his patent beyond the original term of its limitation, he shall make application therefor, in writing, to the Commissioner of Patents, setting forth the reasons why such extension should be granted; and he shall also furnish a written statement, under oath, of the ascertained value of the invention or discovery, and of his receipts and expenditures on account thereof, sufficiently in detail to exhibit a true and faithful account of the loss and profit in any manner accruing to him by reason of the invention or discovery. Such application shall be filed not more than nine months nor less than ninety days before the expiration of the original term of the patent, and no extension shall be granted after the expiration of the original term."

SEC. 2. That section 4927 be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4927. That the Commissioner shall, immediately after the receipt of said application and of the report of the principal examiner, as provided for in section forty-nine hundred and twenty-six of the Revised Statutes, immediately refer said application to the Court of Claims to hear and decide upon the evidence produced both for and against the extension; and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Court of Claims that the patentee, without neglect or fault on his part, has failed to obtain from the use and sale of his invention or discovery a reasonable remuneration for the time, ingenuity, and expense bestowed upon it and the introduction of it into use, and that it is just and proper, having due regard to the public interest, that the term of the patent should be extended, the Court of Claims shall make a certificate thereon, renewing and extending the patent for a term not to exceed seventeen years from the expiration of the first term. Such certificate shall be forwarded to the Commissioner of Patents, to be recorded in the Patent Office; and thereupon such patent shall have the same effect in law as though it had been originally granted for and including the extended term."

It may be interesting to here state, from the official records of the Patent Office, the number of applications for extensions filed and of extensions granted during the years 1872, 1873, and 1874, the last three years of the fourteen-year patents; these can be compared with the number of fourteen-year patents which were granted in 1858, 1859, and 1860 under the act of 1836, to wit:

Applications for extensions	285	-------	-------
Extensions granted	240	-------	-------
Applications for extensions	-------	273	-------
Extensions granted	-------	233	-------
Applications for extensions	-------	-------	216
Extensions granted	-------	-------	199

The number of patents issued in the years 1858, 1859, and 1860, which would expire in 1872, 1873, 1874, under the original term, was, respectively, as follows: 1858, 3,467; 1859, 4,165; 1860, 4,363; total, 11,995.

It will thus be seen that of the 774 applications for extensions out of 11,995 patents, the Commissioner of Patents, in view of the reports of his expert examiners, the proof as to receipts and the disbursements of the patentees, the importance of the invention to the public as well as to the patentees themselves, the causes which had prevented the patentees, although diligent according to their abilities, from either placing their improvements on the market or reaping their merited reward, the nature of the invention and the prior state of the art, found that 672 out of 774 of applicants for extensions were justly entitled to have their patents extended for seven years, the only term under the statute of 1836 for which the Commissioner of Patents could grant an extension.

It will be seen that the enactment of any one of the four bills, or of a bill combining features of two or more of them, would not require one dollar of Government money; even should a board, to be attached to the Patent Office, or a commission, as proposed, be appointed, the entire expense thereof could be paid out of the five millions of surplus to the credit of the patent fund, every dollar of which came from the pockets of inventors and others interested in patents, or out of the current receipts of the Patent Office, without absorbing more than from one-sixth to one-tenth of the large annual surplus, and without taking one dollar from the previous surplus.

It is eminently proper that a portion of the large surplus which has accumulated from the fees paid by the fraternity of inventors should be devoted to securing a modicum of justice to the unlucky brother who has seen his bright hopes, founded on valuable discoveries, end in bitterness and disappointment.

Litigation, protracted through years, fruitless quest for capital, fruitless expenditures of his own resources, heart-breaking disappointments, and grinding poverty too often fill up the short term of a patent.

What better use could be made of the really small amount of money that would be required to pay the expenses of such a court, board, or commission than is herein proposed? Its proceedings would be analagous to the proceedings before the Privy Council of England which, after hearing the petitioner, and any opponents and "inquiring of the whole matter," advises the Crown whether an extension not exceeding fourteen years, making twenty-eight years in all, shall or shall not be granted.

The surplus fund of the Patent Office has been mentioned above as a source from which the expenses of the court, board, or commission for hearing and considering extension cases might be derived. It could, however, be arranged to avoid any draft on said fund. A fee might be charged in extension cases, fifty dollars, as formerly, when application is made, and fifty dollars when it is granted; these fees would probably render the board, etc., self-supporting. It seems to me that only a nominal fee should be required when the application is filed.

In a speech delivered in the House of Representatives on June 13, 1882, by Hon. Thomas D. Young, of Ohio. He said:

"Speaking of the receipts of the office and the reason why this amendment should be adopted, let me state that the surplus receipts of the Patent Office over expenditures for the last year were $248,000. This money is covered into the United States Treasury. Where does it come from? From the pockets of inventors and the people who sustain inventors by buying their patents for use in different manufactories.

* * * * * * *

"And more than that, Mr. Chairman, the $248,000 which goes into the Treasury is a surplus which was never intended to go there. The Patent Office was established in the first place for the purpose of encouraging the useful arts. If any gentleman on this floor assumes or pretends it was intended as a revenue office I should like to know it. If it were intended as a portion of the internal-revenue system to gather money into the Treasury taken from the people for specific reasons and purposes, then the Patent Office ought to belong to the Internal Revenue Bureau and be legislated for accordingly. But there never was any such intention on the part of the men who originated the Patent Office, as the law establishing it declared it was established for the encouragement of the useful arts. It was intended to be self-sustaining and to pay its own way, and it does pay its own way and has this surplus. Men come here and on the ground of retrenchment and economy say it is a great extravagance and that it ought not to exist.

* * * * * * *

"Surely this Congress can be equally liberal in permitting the Patent Office to expend a few thousand dollars of its own earnings for the benefit of the Government, for the benefit of all classes of our people, and thereby 'promote the useful arts.' * * *

"As this fund accumulates propositions are annually made in Congress to divert it from its legitimate uses to educational or other enterprises entirely foreign to our patent system. Does it not seem the part of duty as well as of wisdom and sound policy that it should be taken from the idleness which is suggested by these threatening propositions and employed in a channel where it would be fruitful of so much good to inventors and the public?"

In that great speech, delivered in the United States Senate on March 31, 1884, by Hon. ORVILLE H. PLATT, of Connecticut, who is still in the Senate and is one of its most useful members, a speech that has become a classic in literature relating to inventions and patents, a speech which ought to be read by every patriotic American citizen, and especially by lawyers who make a specialty of patent practice and by inventors, on the "Reorganization of the Patent Office," Senator PLATT said:

"That is a fine showing for an office in this Government which is not only paying its way, but paying at the rate of from $200,000 to $500,000 a year into the national Treasury.

"While I have been speaking I have received from a prominent manufacturing firm in my own State a dispatch asking me if I can not say something in favor of reducing patent fees. Mr. President, the patent fees ought to be reduced. A tax upon inventors which produces more than enough to pay the current expenses of the office is simply shameful. It is a tax upon knowledge, a tax on invention, a tax which in itself is as iniquitous and abominable as a tax upon authors or scientists would be. Still I am compelled to say that I do not want the fees paid by inventors reduced until the Patent Office becomes a separate department. I want this glaring inconsistency of the inventors of the country paying the expenses of that branch of the Government and furnishing the Government from $300,000 to $500,000 annually in addition to continue until its voice shall be heard through the land in favor of the establishment of the Patent Office as an independent department.

"Agriculturists have been slow to acknowledge their dependence on patents, but they have been loud in their demands for the enlargement of the Agricultural Department. What was the origin of the Agricultural Department? It is the child of the Patent Office. The Patent Commissioner had charge of the agricultural work from 1836 to 1862, and if I am not mistaken the inventors of the country paid the entire expense of that service in connection with the Patent Office for twenty-five years. Until 1849 there was no separate report. The Commissioner of Patents reported his work in the agricultural line, and from 1849 up to 1862, when there was a separate report, it was called the Patent Office Report, and to-day men write me for the Agricultural Report and call it the Patent Office Report. Many of the farmers in this country still believe that the Agricultural Department is in some way connected with the Patent Office.

"The Agricultural Department is the daughter of the Patent Office, but we have taken the daughter away from her mother; we have built her a fine house and furnished elegant surroundings; we have given her costly and fashionable clothing; we pet—I will not say pamper—her; we pay her every possible attention, while the old lady, her foster mother, still scrubs along in the kitchen of the Interior Department, and is never noticed except when she deposits the surplus of her daily earnings in the Treasury for the benefit of the rest of the family. It is a shame, and the inventors are beginning to regard it as a shame, and they are going to be heard in their demand that the Patent Office shall receive better treatment than it has received. I make no complaint that the Agricultural Department has been made independent; I only protest against the studied neglect of its parent."

To show that it has never been the intention of Congress to make the Patent Office more than self-sustaining, and that we may therefore reasonably expect that Congress will, in response to a general demand therefor, enact a law which will provide for the hearing and determination of applications for extensions, and for the payment thereof by making a small draft upon the annual surplus of the Patent Office which goes to the credit of the patent fund, I give below eight extracts from the patent laws, beginning with the first act of 1790, to wit:

Section 7 of the act of 1790 provided that a patentee must pay the following fees before the issuance of letters patent, to wit: "For receiving and filing the petition, fifty cents; for filing specifications, per copy sheet containing one hundred words, ten cents; for making out patent, two dollars; for affixing great seal, one dollar; for indorsing the date of delivering the same to the patentee, including all intermediate services, twenty cents."

The total cost of a patent, estimating the specification to contain one thousand words, was $4.70.

Section 11 of the act of 1793 required the applicant to deposit $30 with his petition, said amount to be passed to the credit of the applicant "in full for the sundry services to be performed in the office of the Secretary of State consequent on such petition, and shall pass to the account of clerk-hire in that office."

Section 9 of the act of 1836 required the applicant to deposit $30, "And the moneys received into the Treasury under this act shall constitute a fund for the payment of the salaries of the officers and clerks herein provided for, and all other expenses of the Patent Office, and to be called the Patent Fund."

Section 7 of the act of 1861 authorized the Commissioner to appoint "such additional number of principal examiners, first assistant examiners, and second assistant examiners as may be required to transact the current business of the office with dispatch, * * * and that the total annual expenses of the Patent Office shall not exceed the annual receipts."

An act approved March 29, 1867, entitled "An act to increase the force of the Patent Office, authorized the Commissioner to appoint, from time to time, "such additional number of principal examiners, first assistant examiners, and second assistant examiners as may be required to transact the current business of the office with dispatch," provided that "the total annual expenses of the Patent Office shall not exceed its annual receipts."

An act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30,1869, and for other purposes," approved July 20, 1868, contained the following: "Provided, That all the moneys standing to the credit of the Patent Fund, in the hands of the Commissioner of Patents, and all moneys hereafter received at the Patent Office for any purpose, or from any source whatever, shall be paid into the Treasury as received, without any deduction whatever."

Section 69 of the act of 1870 provided that "all money received at the Patent Office, for any purpose, or from any source whatever, shall be paid into the Treasury as received without any deduction whatever; and all disbursements for said office shall be made by the disbursing clerk of the Interior Department."

Section 496, Revised Statutes, provides that "all disbursements for the Patent Office shall be made by the disbursing clerk of the Interior Department."

These extracts from the patent laws show that Mr. Young was correct in stating that the Patent Office was not designed to be a revenue office, but that the fees established by law were merely to make the Patent Office self-supporting. While the charges for an United States patent are less, in proportion to the territory and numerous interests covered, than those of any other government in the world, still these charges have produced a revenue of over $5,000,000, which amount is now increasing at the rate of from $150,000 to $200,000 (more or less) per year. As hereinbefore suggested, a very small part of this annual surplus would be required to pay the expenses of a court, board, or commission, to hear and determine upon applications for extensions, and in view of the large annual surplus and the fact that applications for extensions are largely from inventors who have failed to secure any proper reward for their inventions, and who, as a rule, have lost money rather than made it out of their patents, it seems to me that the hearing of an application for extension should involve only a nominal charge against the applicant, instead of costing him $50 or $100.

The surplus for the year 1901 was $152,012.52, which made the total surplus of the Patent Fund on January 1, 1901, $5,329,471.07. Certainly Congress will not allow the surplus fund or any portion of it to be diverted "from its legitimate uses to educational or other enterprises entirely foreign to our patent system" as long as inventors, from whom the money was received, are demanding that a small portion thereof shall be set apart to pay for investigations which will serve to carry out the great objects of the patent laws, will enable the Government to carry out its contracts with inventors, and will secure to inventors, who have acted in good faith in efforts to carry out their contracts, a further opportunity to accomplish the results contemplated by the original contract, namely, to practically promote the useful arts and to reasonably reward the inventors of such improvements.

Notwithstanding the large surplus to the credit of the patent fund, the Commissioner of Patents is engaged in a constant stife to secure appropriations to provide for contingent expenses. The writer has been fully informed of the fact that it required the cooperation of the Commissioner of Patents, the chief clerk of the Patent Office, and the chief clerk of the Department of the Interior for a period of several months in "cutting and shaving here and there" in order to provide rubber tips on legs of chairs and strips of carpet for use under the tables used by inventors and their attorneys in the attorneys' room of the Patent Office. These "improvements" were solicited by a committee, representing a law association, to prevent the noise caused by moving chairs and the feet of their occupants on the marble floors.

In speaking of the Patent Office, Senator PLATT has said: "Notwithstanding the office is self-supporting, all disbursements must be made by the disbursing clerk of the Secretary (of the Interior). The Commissioner can not order the purchase of a board to be used in reproducing a model called for in the trial of a cause without the approbation of this clerk."

While I am fully in sympathy with Congress in safe-guarding the patent fund by imposing all reasonable restrictions upon the appropriations therefrom, such as the requirements that the Commissioner of Patents shall pay "all money received at the Patent Office, for any purpose, or from any source whatever, into the Treasury as received, without any deduction whatever; and that all disbursements for said office shall be made by the disbursing clerk of the Interior Department," I do not share in the objection of some, that in order to secure favorable action upon a bill to undo the wrong which has resulted from the repeal of the law of 1836, which provided for the extension of patents in proper cases, it will be necessary to so frame the bill as to avoid any reduction of the surplus which would otherwise go into the Treasury of the United States. It is my conviction that if Congress can be made to believe that a small draft upon the surplus of the Patent Office receipts to pay for the hearing of extension applications "would be fruitful of so much good to inventors and the public," that such use of a small part of said surplus would not be "diverting it from its legitimate uses" and be "foreign to our patent system," but would "benefit all classes of our people and promote the useful arts," we shall find that Congress will promptly consent not only to enact an extension law of some kind, but will reduce the cost of hearing an application for an extension to an amount which may cause a small reduction of the annual surplus.

I wish here to state that a patent is not a monopoly, as that word is usually understood. I recall that in a recent speech a distinguished United States Senator said that "patents constitute the only monopolies in this country." In Blackstone's Commentaries "monopoly" is defined as "a license or privilege allowed by the King for the sole buying and selling, making, working, or using of anything whatsoever; whereby the subject in general is restrained from the liberty of manufacture or trading which he had before." Under the word "monopoly," the Century Dictionary says: "The exclusive privileges conferred on inventors and authors by the patent and copyright laws, for the sake of the encouragement of the arts and literature, and extending only to articles originally devised under that encouragement, are not deemed monopolies." In Robinson on Patents we are told that a patent "lays no burden upon the people except that of remaining for a while without that which they never yet enjoyed."

To give a general idea of the practical working of the law of 1836 as applied to the extension of patents by the Patent Office, I think it would serve a very useful purpose to present to the reader copies of the papers in two actual applications for extension. The cases which I have selected are very fair samples taken from the 672 extensions that were granted in the years 1872, 1873, and 1874. Each case comprises the petition of the applicant, under oath, giving a history of the case, including receipts and disbursements, the report of the expert examiner, and the action of the Commissioner. The first case is that of Joseph W. Fowle, the second that of Philander Shaw.

Mr. Fowle was a pioneer inventor of a "steam drilling apparatus." As Mr. Fowle's "invention was in advance of public demand," and he was "cramped" in money matters, he sold one-half of his patent to a party by the name of Jenks, who failed to promote the patent in accordance with his agreement. Although the invention was worth millions of dollars to the American people alone, and as that value was unknown to Fowle, he placed it at the very modest value of $25,000. Notwithstanding the great commercial value of the invention and the extended term of seven years given by Commissioner Holloway, Fowle was an applicant before Congress for a second extension to enable him to secure the necessaries of life. The private bill for his relief failed and poor Fowle went down to his grave unrewarded for his great invention. Fowle's working model would drill a hole 3 inches in diameter in a block of hard Quincy granite at the rate of 17 feet per hour. The Senate and House Committees on Patents, who heard and considered Fowle's application for a second extension, were informed, by perfectly responsible parties, that they would give Mr. Fowle $10,000 a year and a bond to secure the payment thereof for each year of extension that Congress would grant.

Mr. Philander Shaw, whose case was argued by the writer before the Commissioner of Patents, received about $20,000, although more than that amount had been spent in his efforts to perfect and improve his machine.

And so, if we were to examine the papers in the 672 patents that were extended during a period of three years, we should find, as a rule, that the applicants had either not been fairly rewarded, or were seeking extensions to enable them to promote their patents for the mutual benefit of the country and themselves.

The papers of Messrs. Fowle and Shaw follow in the order named:

"BOSTON, MASS., January 3, 1865.

"Honorable COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS.

"SIR: In the matter of my application for extension of the patent granted me March 11, 1851, for improvements in steam drilling apparatus, for which my petition was filed, December 9, 1864, and in conformity with the law and rule of your office requiring a written statement under oath of the ascertained value of the invention and of the receipts and expenditures in connection therewith, I respectfully submit the following: It is impossible for me to make any exact statement of the value of my invention for the reason that it has never yet been used in regular daily work. The reason for this is that my invention was made at a time when I was seized with rheumatism, which has, since 1856, become chronic and has crippled me to such an extent as to distort my body, especially my hands and feet, so that for a long time I have not been able to dress and undress myself, nor am I able to perform work, but gain my living by having two apprentices who do the work in my machine shop under my direction and assisted by me to the extent of my limited physical ability.

"My invention was in advance of public demand during the first years of its existence, and during the latter years I have been physically incapacitated from getting it adopted by the public, and during the whole time of its existence I have been cramped in my money matters, having only what I earn at my trade as a machinist. In consequence of my physical infirmities and lack of capital, I sold to Lemuel P. Jenks, of Boston, one-half of my patent on condition that he should use his time, influence, and abilities in introducing the invention into public use, and should make the expenditures needed for that purpose; and for the further consideration of the payment of $250 to me and the payments of the expenses of procuring the United States patent. Mr. Jenks spent some time upon the matter, but as no results followed, I concluded that I had overestimated his abilities and his financial condition, for he failed to pay Messrs. Hinckley & Drury, of this city, machinists, for the construction and material for a drill for which I made the drawings, and also to pay for taking out the patent, money for which I furnished myself.

"I was offered in 1854 $8,000 for my patent, which offer I accepted, and should have got the money, which I very much needed, but for the fact that I had also to deal with Mr. Jenks, who, in endeavoring to get more, failed to get anything either for himself or for me.

"At the present time, in consequence of the large amount of tunneling done and to be done in California and elsewhere, much of it through solid rock, I consider the value of my invention to be quite large, and as I suppose some value must be fixed upon it, I should say that its value is not less than $25,000. To enable you to form an idea of the value of the invention from its practical working, I would state that in the year of 1860 I exhibited to some members of the Massachusetts legislature the practical working of my drill. The machine exhibited had a 2¼-inch cylinder with a stroke of 10 inches. The operation was performed on a block of hard Quincy granite 8 by 4 by 2 feet, and a hole of three inches in diameter was drilled into the block at the rate of 17 feet per hour and under the disadvantage that the block moved or was driven from the drilling machine by its blows. If my patent is extended, both myself and the public will be benefited, because I shall be free from control or connection with Mr. Jenks, and my friends will supply for my benefit the funds needed, as the results will not be claimed by Mr. Jenks to the amount of one-half.

Receipts.

From L. P. Jenks	$250.00

The above is the only receipt I have ever had for on account of the matter of my invention.

Expenditures.

Cost of material, workman's wages, rent, and estimated value of my time at daily wages expended in making an experimental working machine as nearly as I can estimate, not having kept accounts or books.	$1,500
Value of my time expended in making drawings and in directing the construction of the drill before mentioned, as constructed by Hinckley & Drury, of Boston, under contract or agreement with L. P. Jenks, and for which they were not paid, about	250

Cost of making model filed in the Patent Office, about	$50
Cost of a finished portable working model designed to exhibit and introduce the invention	200
Paid for procuring the patent	75
	2,075

The above are not all of my expenditures either of time or money, but are all I can now state with certainty under oath.

Expenditures	$2,075
Receipts	250
Excess of expenditures over receipts	1,825

Extension.

In the matter of the application of Joseph W. Fowle for extension of letters patent (No. 7972) for steam drilling machine.

Upon examination of the testimony and exhibits filed in this case it is found:

1. That the invention is novel.

2. That its utility has never been practically tested. The testimony of three chief engineers and mechanics make their statements showing its utility and practicability, and its construction gives evidence of great mechanical skill on the part of the inventor.

3. Its value and importance to the public is also produced upon the statements of the witnesses referred to, no other evidence having been submitted except that of the oath of the applicant.

4. The statement of account shows that the only amount received by the applicant was the sum of $250, and the expenditures $2,075. The want of success in the sale or manufacture of this machine is alleged to be that the invention was in advance of public sentiment, and physical disability on the part of the applicant prevented him from taking an active interest in the invention. The $250 above referred to as being used was for the sale of one-half interest in the patent. No internal-revenue certificate is attached to the sworn statement of the applicant, which is received and submitted.

UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE,
March 2, 1865.

Application of Joseph W. Fowle for an extension of the letters patent for a steam drill granted him the 11th of March, 1857.

Upon reference from the Commissioner to the examiners-in-chief.

The examiners-in-chief respectfully report in pursuance of said reference as follows:

There seems little or no room for hesitation in granting this petition; the novelty and usefulness of the invention have been considered by the primary examiners and have been found sufficient. Its value and importance are abundantly established by affidavits. It is true that the affidavits place no exact estimate upon it, as it is obvious they could not add to their testimony, but their testimony is none the less satisfactory upon that account. The patentee has never received but $250 from it, and it hardly needs any statement of profits to produce the conviction that he has "not been adequately remunerated for his time and expenses in originating and perfecting his invention."

The only question that remains is as to his having "used due diligence in introducing his invention into general use." It is shown that soon after he obtained his patent he became an invalid through chronic rheumatism, and has ever since been rendered incapable of labor or of active exertion. In order to bring his machine into use he sold one-half of the invention for the above sum of $250. The purchaser was to furnish in addition necessary funds to defray the expenses of procuring the patent and build experimental machines, and was also to make the efforts requisite to bring the machine into public use. In all this he utterly failed, and the negotiations turned out to be a fatal obstacle in the way of all endeavors to bring the invention into the market, instead of facilitating them. No one was willing to embark in an undertaking while another was to share equally in the profits. As this right expires with the original term of the patent, the applicant's friends are now ready to furnish the assistance requisite to introduce the invention into general use. That this has not been done before, and that the inventor has received no adequate reward for his ingenuity, is owing to no neglect on his part, as is manifest from the slight sketch which has been given of the history of the device.

We respectfully recommend that the prayer of the petitioner be granted.

All of which is submitted.

PATENT OFFICE, WASHINGTON,
March 6, 1865.

The foregoing report is approved, and the term of the said patent is hereby extended for a term of seven years from and after the 11th day of March, 1865.

(Signed) D. P. HOLLOWAY,
Commissioner.

To the Commissioner of Patents:

Respectfully representing Philander Shaw, of Boston, in the county of Suffolk and State of Massachusetts, that he is the inventor of a certain novel and useful improved air engine, which is of great value and importance to the public; that on the 2d day of May, A. D. 1854, your petitioner obtained letters patent of the United States for said invention, to which your petitioner craves leave to refer for a more full description thereof; and that afterwards, to wit, in or about July, A. D. 1860, said letters patent were surrendered by your petitioner, and were afterwards, to wit, on the 17th day of July, A. D. 1860, reissued to your petitioner with an amended and more perfect specification, to which your petitioner craves leave for greater certainty to refer.

That your petitioner has been at great expense and charge in introducing his said invention to the public, has expended nearly all of his time and great sums of money in perfecting his said invention and in experimenting for its improvement, and that he has not yet received any return for his time and expense in originating and perfecting his said invention—any adequate remuneration—nor in fact has been repaid the expenses he has incurred in originating, developing, and perfecting his said invention.

And that from and after the date of said letters patent, to wit, from said 2d day of May, A. D. 1854, your petitioner has used all due diligence in introducing his said invention into general use.

Wherefore, your petitioner prays that the letters patent issued to him for his said invention may be extended for the further term of seven years from the 2d day of May, A. D. 1868.

Signed at Boston this 13th day of January, A. D. 1868.

(Signed) PHILANDER SHAW.

In the matter of the application of Philander Shaw for an extension of his letters patent for his air engine, granted May 2, 1854, and reissued July 17, 1860, and April 23, 1861.

The applicant in this case seeks to extend his patent, and gives as a reason that he has not been adequately remunerated for his time, ingenuity, and expenses in perfecting and introducing his invention.

As to the novelty of the device, it may be said that including the present examination, the case has been four times passed upon by this office, and each time, at least by inference, declared as it is now believed to be, novel.

In reference to its utility no doubt exists.

Is it valuable and important to the public? In answer to the above question it may be said that its value and importance have not been very thoroughly tested, as it appears from the statement of the applicant that only four of the engines are in successful operation. It is proper to say, however, in this connection, that Mr. C. C. Parker, a person apparently well qualified to judge, regards the invention as very valuable and important. What its value to the public is no attempt is made to show.

Has the inventor been adequately remunerated for his time and expense in originating and perfecting it?

Here the examiner is left entirely in the dark, as by the admission of the applicant he has not kept any account of his receipts or expenditures on account of the patent, and the only approximation which he can make to such amounts, as he says, "to the best of his knowledge and belief, he has received $20,000 from his invention and has expended the same amount."

In this connection, Mr. Nathaniel Harris states that he has been well acquainted with Mr. Shaw's efforts to perfect and introduce his invention. That during all of those years he has devoted himself entirely to the work, but he (Harris) believes that it has been a source of loss to the inventor.

In reference to the diligence of the applicant in introducing the invention into public use, there does not seem to be any reason to doubt that a due amount has been used. The statements of Mr. Harris, Mr. Parker, and Mr. Edson confirm and, it is believed, prove this fact.

From what has been said it will be seen that the only question which remains in doubt is the amount of compensation received and which should be passed to the credit of this patent. The applicant states that all he has received has been expended or is pledged for indebtedness, but he is reminded that all he has received may, or may not, be on account of this patent, while what he has expended and what he owes may not be in any sense chargeable to such patent.

It is to be regretted that persons intending to apply for extensions of their patents will not keep such accounts of the receipts and expenditures as will enable those whose duty it is to decide upon the merits of their case the means of doing so intelligently and of carefully comparing their rights with the rights of the public, so that neither be insensed (?), as is quite likely to be the case in the absence of a statement showing clearly how much the applicant has secured and the public have paid.

In the present case it appears that $20,000 is the gross amount received, and the only process for arriving at a conclusion seems to be by determining whether that amount, if at all be placed to the credit of the patent, is an "adequate remuneration" to the inventor for his time and expenses in originating and perfecting his invention, in view of what that invention is worth to the public.

In the matter of the petition of Philander Shaw for extension of his patent for an improvement in air engines.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
County of Suffolk, ss.

On this 15th day of April, A. D. 1868, before the subscriber, a justice of the peace for the said county and Commonwealth, personally appeared the above-named Philander Shaw and made solemn oath as follows:

The patent for which I now ask an extension, covers an invention which forms an important feature in the machine I am now making. My subsequent patents, cover inventions for improvements arising from my attempts to perfect the original invention.

As my expenditures on this patent began about fifteen years ago and my receipts about seven years ago, it is absolutely impossible to give exact accounts, my time and mind having been entirely engrossed with producing a perfect air engine and not with financial matters.

To the best of my knowledge and belief, I have laid out on this invention $20,000, which amount has been received; none of the amount of $20,000 has been expended upon any matter not directly connected with this invention, for the purpose of rendering it of utility to the public.

(Signed) PHILANDER SHAW.

Commonwealth of Massachusetts, county of Suffolk, April 15, 1868.

Subscribed and sworn to before me.

GEORGE PUTNAM,
Justice of the Peace.

In the matter of Philander Shaw for an extension of his patent for an improvement in air engines.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
Suffolk County, ss.

On this 10th day March, A. D., 1868, before the subscriber, a justice of the peace for the said county and Commonwealth, personally appeared the above-named Philander Shaw and made solemn oath as follows:

1. That since the original patent for my said invention was obtained, I have been constantly engaged in perfecting and improving it. I believe it to be entirely novel.

2. That my experience and the experience of others engaged in the practical use of my machine demonstrates that they will do twice as much work with a given amount of fuel as any other engine. It is the only air engine that has been successfully used of large sizes.

3. That I believe it to be valuable and important to the public, for the reason that it will accomplish a great saving in expense over other engines capable of doing the same amount of work, and that it can be used where steam engines would be unable to work for want of water. As there is no danger of explosions, it is also safer than the steam engines.

4. That I have not been adequately remunerated for my time and expense in originating and perfecting my said invention. I have devoted nearly the whole of my time and attention for fifteen years to the development and perfecting of my said invention, and I have invented several improvements which have been patented, and it is impossible to separate them from the original invention in such a way as to ascertain accurately the value of the latter, or the precise amount which I have received and expended on account of it. But all the money which I have received from the invention has been expended on it or pledged for indebtedness incurred in developing, improving, and perfecting it. In the course of my experiments with this invention numerous changes and improvements have been made, all requiring time and expense to make the necessary changes and experiments upon them and a sufficient length of time to test them. These numerous improvements, some of them of great value, depend upon the original invention and need the patent of that invention to secure them to me. Want of capital has, at times, greatly interfered with my progress in perfecting and introducing my machine. The experiments are expensive and it takes much time to test all the qualities of an engine, as well as to overcome the prejudices against the use of a new machine. The numerous failures in air engines have reduced the public desire for them, and this distrust can only be removed by long-continued, successful working; but at present there are four in actual operarion; some of them have been a long time at work and they are giving satisfaction. There is also a greater interest in them and an increasing disposition to try them, and if the patent be renewed there is every reason to believe that it will be remunerative.

(Signed.) PHILANDER SHAW.

Subscribed and sworn to on the day first herein mentioned by said Philander Shaw before me.

(Signed.) GEO. PUTNAM,
Justice of the Peace, Suffolk County.

Should the conclusion be reached that the inventor has not been thus remunerated, then it is suggested that the patent ought to be extended, as all the other points seem to the examiner's mind to be clear and in favor of such a result.

Respectfully submitted.

J. M. BLANCHARD,
Examiner in Charge.

TABLE IV.—Showing the dates of issue and dates of expiration of the seventeen-year patents issued from 1861 to 1878.

Patents issued in	1861	1862	1863	1864	1865	1866	1867	1868	1869
Expired	1878	1879	1880	1881	1882	1883	1884	1885	1886

Expired in	1887	1888	1889	1890	1891	1892	1893	1894	1895

In 1878, and not before, were the patentees of 1861 in possession of the full results of the first year's issue of seventeen-year patents. In 1879 the patentees of 1862 were in possession of the results of the second year's issue of seventeen-year patents, and so on up to the year 1895, at which date, and not until then, were inventors in possession of the results of the first seventeen years of patents issued for seventeen years, and in a position to make comparisons of patents issued for a single term of seventeen years, without extension, with patents issued for fourteen years with extension. Referring to Tables I, II, III, and IV, and to plate 1, group 1, of Table 1, shows the population in twelve Southern States, divided by the number of patents issued to citizens of said States for the years given at the head of the columns of figures, e. g. in Alabama, the number of patents issued to citizens for the year 1881 was one patent for every 26,861 of her population, and so on for each succeeding fifth year, 1886, 1891, 1896, and 1901. By means of this table the increase and decrease of the number of patents per annum, in proportion to population, in each of the States named in said group, for the five years above given, can be seen.

The same explanation applies to Group II of the same table. Comparison may be made between the States of the same group and between States of different groups, and between the averages of one group for the five periods named, with similar averages in the other group for the same periods.

Comparing Mississippi and Texas of the first group, we find that, in 1881, these States received one patent per annum for each 26,861 and 8,991, respectively, of their population. Comparing Mississippi and Texas, representing the highest and lowest averages in the first group, with Connecticut and Minnesota representing the highest and lowest averages for the second group, we find that, in 1891, Mississippi and Texas obtained one patent per annum for each 27,599 and 8,991 of population, respectively, whereas Minnesota and Connecticut obtained one patent per annum for every 5,387 and 898, respectively, of population. Texas in one group and Connecticut in another group obtained more patents in the year 1881, in proportion to their population, than any of the other States of the groups in which said States are classed.

Table No. II shows the number of patents issued to citizens of the 12 States named in each of the two groups of States in Table I, for the years 1881, 1886, 1891, 1896, and 1901.

Table III shows the population of each group of States given in Tables I and II, divided by the total population of each group of States for the years 1881, 1886, 1891, 1896, and 1901.

Comparing the States in Group 1 with the States in Group 2, we find, by reference to Table III, that for the year 1881 the number of patents issued to the citizens of the 12 States named in Group 1, was one patent for every 17,038 of the total population, and that the number of patents issued to citizens of the 12 States named in Group 2 was one patent for every 2,650 of the total population. If desired, similar comparisons may be made for the years 1886, 1891, 1896, and 1901.

The irregular unbroken line in Plate No. 1 shows graphically the increase and decrease of invention, in proportion to population at intervals of five years in the States named, as given in figures in Group 1 of Table I and Table II. The dotted line shows the variation from year to year instead of every five years. The unbroken line and the broken dotted line in Plate 2 present a similar illustration of the increase and decrease of invention, etc., in the States named in Group 2 of Table I and Table II.

It will be seen that in each group of States the increase and decrease of patents from 1881 to 1896 was about the same in each group of States, but that from 1896 to 1901 the number of patents increased in the Southern States, Group 1, while there was a material further decrease in the Northern States, Group 2. With the exception of the increase of patents in the 12 Southern States from 1896 to 1901, there has been a gradual decrease in the number of patents issued to citizens of the 24 States, in proportion to the population, ever since 1886.

Manufacturing and the commercial upbuilding of the "New South," have not only arrested the gradual decline in invention in the twelve Southern States, but has materially increased the number of patents issued to their citizens from 1896 to 1901.

This awakening and emergence of the new South from the old was prophesied by Commissioner Holloway in 1863. (Patent Office Report.)

The imagination fails to conceive of the happy future in store for this country when its fairest portion shall be regenerated by a just system of labor, and conquered by free industry; when its land by this change shall, according to the remarkable estimates of Mr. Walker, have an increased value of over six billions of dollars; and when a whole race shall be taught to think, contrive, and create. The richest field of invention, with its fruits of wealth and visions of prosperity, will then be opened that ever occupied the faculties of man. The visions of Virgil and Milton will be realized, and

"Time will run back and fetch the age of gold."

The tables and plates herein shown were prepared from data obtained from the official reports of the Commissioner of Patents.

Taking the ratio of the patents issued to the population in the South as a base, an examination of Tables I, II, and III, and plates 1 and 2, shows that the North received six and five-tenths, seven and three-tenths, six and five-tenths, and five and seven-tenths, as many patents as the South in the years 1881, 1886, 1891, 1896, and 1901, respectfully. These figures show that there has been a gradual increase in the number of patents issued in the South in proportion to its population, whereas in the North the number of patents issued in proportion to the population has gradually decreased.

This is certainly a remarkable exhibition and shows that inventive genius in the South has been increasing since 1896, while it has gradually decreased in the North.

Table IV shows that patents issued for seventeen years from 1861 to 1878, expired from 1878 to 1895.

In a pamphlet, prepared by W. C. Dodge, and published as Senate document No. 438, Mr. Dodge states: "The capital invested in manufactures in the South has grown from $257,000,000 in 1880 to $1,000,000,000 in 1899, and in the decade of 1880 to 1890, her real and personal property increased from $7,600,000,000 to $11,400,000,000, and this is largely due to her engaging in manufactures."

We should therefore understand that although the act of 1836, allowing extension of patents, was repealed in 1861, the first year's issue of seventeen-year patents did not expire until 1878. The patents that were issued for fourteen years previous to 1861 came up for extension in greater or less numbers, until March 2, 1875, at which date the last fourteen-year patents expired. It will be seen, therefore, that no patents expired between March 2, 1875 and March 2, 1878.

Now, what cause, or causes, led to the gradual decrease in invention, from 1886 to 1901, counting back fifteen years from the last annual report of the Commissioner of Patents that was available when these tables and plates were prepared, in the two groups of States named, with the exception noted in the Southern States, from 1896 to 1901?

The necessity for a general law providing for extension of patents is strongly supported by an able and learned argument of Mr. Lysander Hill, in a paper which I heard him read before the American Bar Association on August 29, 1892, and which was subsequently published in pamphlet form by special order of the association, entitled Preliminary Injunctions in Patent Cases. Judge Hill takes the position that if section 4921 of the Revised Statutes were amended by adding thereto the following words:

"Injunctions to restrain infringements pendente lite shall not be denied on the mere ground that the patent is of recent date or has not been adjudicated." It would cut off scores of applications to Congress for extensions, "imperatively demanding justice from Congress by reason of the broken promises and bad faith of the Government," not the legislative or executive, but the judicial branch thereof, in not securing to patentees the exclusive right to make, use, and sell their improvements during the entire life of their patents. Such cases as Judge Hill describes show the necessity for some general law which will enable a patentee to secure an extension of his grant for a period equal to that which he has lost through unforeseen litigation, or other causes beyond his control.

Of course a patentee is not obliged to sue an infringer, and thus bring upon himself the cost of a suit and the delay, etc., which the refusal of a motion for a preliminary injunction may involve, but having concluded to commence a suit, if the expense of the trial, the competition arising from such infringement, and his inability to make his patent productive while ligitation is in progress, leaves him without remuneration, does not good faith and justice on the part of the Government, under the contract with the inventor to "secure" to him the "exclusive" right to the patented invention, entitle the inventor to have his patent extended for a term that will give him the statutory seventeen years of "exclusive" right, especially if the inventor has lost, rather than made money, while the public has been greatly benefited?

Judge Hill says:

"Under such a constitutional provision, as held by the Supreme Court in Grant vs. Raymond (6 Pet., 218) and other cases, patents issued for new inventions are contracts between the Government and the patentee, by which the Government agrees 'to secure' to him, for the term of his patent, 'the exclusive right to his discovery.' * * * The public began to realize that the law had created a new industry—that of making inventions—and that it opened to every man, even the poorest, the opportunity for sudden wealth. With the amendments of 1819 and 1836, which practically perfected the law, valuable inventions and discoveries multiplied with amazing rapidity, and the country entered upon an era of industrial progress unexampled in all history. Congress, in close touch with the people, participated in the general appreciation of the patent system, witnessed with satisfaction and pride its effect upon the development of our manufactures, agriculture, and commerce, and has never since failed to maintain it and to adopt any measures agreed upon by its friends for the purpose of improving and perfecting it."

* * * "This neglect of the Federal courts to give due weight, on motion for preliminary injunction, to the almost conclusive presumption of validity which inheres in American patents from the moment of their issue, has inflicted and is inflicting an injury to our patent system and to the owners of patent property, which it is difficult to overestimate."

* * * "If infringements begin early enough there can then be no period of 'exclusive possession' or 'acquiescence,' and the patentee is obliged to wait until the final decree on the merits of the case, and then await the result of an appeal before he can receive any relief. Experience has shown that if the defendant be rich, and disposed to make a stubborn fight, he can delay the final hearing, and the hearing on appeal, from five to ten years, and in some cases almost or quite to the end of the term of the patent. Meanwhile, he is using the invention, and, perhaps, making a fortune out of it; and his success in pirating the patentee's property and avoiding punishment induces other infringers to enter the field, deters capitalists from coming to the aid of the patentee, and destroys the market value of the patent. I have encountered a case, in my own practice, where my client, who had made and patented one of the most valuable inventions of modern times, was obliged to spend the entire term of his patent in wearisome and expensive litigation. Just as the patent was expiring the courts decided that it was broadly valid; but it was then too late to be of any substantial benefit to the patentee. He had exhausted his financial resources in the long struggle; had been obliged to witness infringers making millions out of his invention, while capitalists declined to embark in his enterprise by reason of the infringements and of the want of protection; had seen even the Government itself profiting from it to the extent of about ten millions of dollars, through its infringing contractors, while its courts were refusing protection, and had been all the while unable to put his invention into use for his own benefit, because, under the conditions existing, capitalists declined to furnish the means necessary for that purpose. To him the Constitution and the patent statutes passed in pursuance thereof were more than 'hollow mockery'—they had actually enticed him to his ruin, by holding out the promise of protection, which the courts, for seventeen years, refused to perform. Under the practice by which that was done, every inventor who makes a valuable invention or discovery that requires a large capital to operate it, is liable to the fate of my unfortunate client; and the greater the money-making capacity of the invention, the greater the temptation to infringe, and the more stubbornly will the infringer contest, while his large profits enable him to protract the litigation almost indefinitely at the sole expense and risk of the patentee, for it is out of his property that all the expenses on both sides are paid. The rigid technical rules governing accountings in patent cases practically prohibit the recovery of profits or damages, and the infringer is left to enjoy his ill-gotten gains.

"The time thus lost to the patentee is the most valuable portion of his term, when usually he is poor and needs protection to enable him to establish his business and secure a market, or to enable him to dispose of his patent for an adequate consideration. It is then that infringement is most disastrous to him; for it impairs public confidence in his rights, prevents capital from investing under them, encourages others to infringe, and by unscrupulous and ruinous competition destroys the possibility of deriving profits from his patents. In fact I have known many cases where through the inaction of the courts the patent has been of vastly greater protection to the infringer than to the patentee.

"To appreciate the gross injustice and illegality of the present practice, look at a few simple and indisputable facts: The Constitution gives Congress only one authority in the premises, namely, the authority to 'secure' to the inventor 'the exclusive right' to his invention or discovery 'for limited times,' leaving it to that body to fix the limit; Congress (Rev. Stat., sec. 4884) has fixed the limit at seventeen years, and has declared the right 'exclusive' for that period; and (sec. 4921) it has given the Federal courts power to grant injunctions 'to prevent the violation of any right secured by patent.' By the plain language both of the statutes and the Constitution the right is to be secured to the inventor, is to be exclusive, and is to run, not for a portion of the period limited, but for the whole of it; and the purpose of the entire provision is 'to promote the progress of' the 'useful arts.' By the practice of the courts, however, the right is not secured to the inventor, is not exclusive, does not run for the period limited, and the effect is not to promote, but to retard, the progress of the useful arts. The courts, conceding themselves to be destitute of authority to lengthen the term of the patent, assume the authority to shorten it to any extent they may please by simply refusing to enforce the right until years have elapsed after the beginning of the term. * * *

"There is another strong reason why the present practice should be abolished, and that is, that such a change will materially conduce to the relief of Congress from extension cases in the future; whereas, under the practice now prevailing, such cases are liable to be multiplied almost indefinitely, and to demand much time and labor which could be profitably employed on matters of general legislation. Patentees who are robbed of protection by the courts for a considerable portion * * * of the term of their respective patents, have a strong equitable claim upon the Government to make good its promise of protection for a period of seventeen years. They plead, with irresistible force, that the Government has practically repudiated its solemn contract, and by false pretenses of future protection, has cheated them out of their inventions. * * * No Congressman possessed of a fine moral sense, trained in the study of law and equity, can turn a deaf ear to petitions asking for such manifest justice; and the result is that much valuable time is employed in hearing and in considering them."

The amendment to 4921 R. S., proposed by Judge Hill, would, if made, undoubtedly reduce the number of applications for extension, either to Congress under the law as it now exists or under any new law that may be passed conferring jurisdiction of extension of patents upon some court or commission. But, whatever the law may be, there will always be a certain percentage of cases in which the inventor may be justly entitled to an extension; hence the necessity for a general law, irrespective of the future action of the courts, to enable an inventor to secure an extension, since no amount of care and diligence on the part of judges in administering the patent laws can overcome the necessity of providing some general law for the extension of patents which shall do away with the necessity of the passage of private bills by Congress. Remember the facts brought out in the Fowle extension case, hereinbefore repeated.

Fowle had a great and valuable invention, but having brought on great physical disabilities, partly through exposure while experimenting with his invention, being anxious to promote it, he sold a half interest to a man whom Fowle supposed to have means, and who agreed to build machines, etc., but Jenks, the assignee, failed to keep his contract, even to the extent of paying the attorney for his services in preparing and prosecuting the application for a patent, and held on to his half interest to the end of the term of the patent, thus disabling Fowle from getting another partner in Jenks's place. Fowle having impoverished himself and being in poor health, was in no position financially to bring a suit against Jenks to enforce specific performance of his contract or to have the assignment canceled. The case of Fowle bears out the statement of ex-Commissioner Leggett, which statement is also confirmed by the experience of every attorney who was in practice under the old law, that frequently the extended term of a patent is the only portion of the entire term that is remunerative to the inventor, he having under press of financial depression been obliged to sell a portion or even the entire interest in his patent for practically a nominal amount.

To prevent the general decline in invention—which is partly due to the failure of the courts, under the present practice, to grant preliminary injunctions, which would be granted if the prevailing practice did not prohibit it, and partly to the hopelessness of present efforts before Congress to secure the extension of a patent by a private bill—further legislative action is necessary.

ALTHOUGH HAVING THE BEST PATENT SYSTEM ON EARTH, EXTENSIONS SHOULD BE GRANTED WHEN INVENTIONS HAVE NOT BEEN PLACED ON THE MARKET, OR INVENTORS HAVE NOT BEEN SUITABLY REWARDED—ON GROUNDS OF PUBLIC POLICY, AND TO CARRY OUT IN GOOD FAITH THE CONTRACT BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT AND INVENTOR, THE INVENTOR SHOULD BE GRANTED, IN PROPER CASES, AN EXTENSION OF HIS PATENT—DEBT OF GOVERNMENT TO ITS INVENTORS.

We must not think because we are in possession of a picture and specification of an invention, that no benefit will come from an extension. If no one but the inventor thinks his device useful, or believes that it possesses commercial value, no one but the inventor will develop it; hence, the public will suffer no harm by granting him an extension. If, during the extended term, it is satisfactorily demonstrated that the invention possesses merit, then both the people and the inventor will be benefited by the extension. In such a case the extension will accomplish three things: It will encourage other inventors; it will encourage and reward the particular inventor, and it will give the public the benefit of the further efforts of the inventor to develop a new industry.

If unsuccessful inventors should be given additional time in which to perfect or promote their inventions, how much stronger are the claims of those who have actually succeeded in demonstrating the practicability of their inventions but require more time to manufacture their improvements and place them on the market. Shall not they who have fathered an idea, reduced it to a form in which it will be beneficial to mankind, studied and corrected its faults and imperfections, receive their rewards so justly earned, or shall they be cut off from that which is their own just as it is ready to take its place in the world's economy? Public policy demands that extensions be granted to both classes alike; to the unsuccessful, for they may become successful; and to this class who have only demonstrated the practicability of their inventions but have not yet obtained their reward.

Dickens, poor inventor, said:

"Is it reasonable to make a man feel as if, in inventing an ingenious improvement meant to do good, he has done something wrong? How else can a man feel after he is met with difficulties at every turn? * * * And look at the expense, how hard on me, and how hard on the country, if there is any merit in me (and my invention is took up now, I am thankful to say, and doing well), to put me to all that expense."

Is it not plain that invention will decline, or be at least retarded to some extent, if the country has an inventor here and there who has attracted public notice by his efforts and expenditure, even to the point of personal sacrifice of himself and family, to add something to the sum of human knowledge and who, perhaps in advanced life, finds that the labor of a lifetime is to remain unrewarded and unproductive either to himself or his family because, through some matter beyond his control, his patent expired before his work was accomplished? Will not other inventors, or would-be inventors, look at him in his sorrow and disappointment and say: "No; I do not care to repeat his experience even to benefit my country and the world in general; I can not afford it. The Government will not protect me beyond the term of my original grant, no matter what misfortunes and disappointment I may encounter, through ill health, litigation, the execution of unwise contracts, or inexperience, my invention being ahead of the times, or finding unlooked for obstacles in the way of creating a market for my improvements."

I know that such cases are merely exceptions to the rule, that about 95 per cent or more of patentees would not ask for extensions if they could, having either received a just remuneration or something better having taken the market. Of course death of patentees would cut off many applications that otherwise would be made.

But assuming that applications for extensions under a general extension law would amount to 5 per cent, or even less, may that 5 per cent not contain a Whitney, a Fulton, a Park, a McCormick, a Bessemer, a Wood, a Henry, a Goodyear, a Morse, a Bell, an Edison, a Marconi, and thousands of others who have added to the progress of the world and promoted the comfort and happiness of mankind, to say nothing of the hundreds of thousands of lesser lights who have not only benefited themselves but have added more or less to the glory of their country.

Why should a nation voluntarily cut itself off from the benefit that it would secure, be it more or less, from the passage of a general extension law? By making it possible, through such a law, to reduce the per cent of failures, a corresponding increase would result in favor of those who succeed. As far as the public is concerned, a patented improvement that is not on the market is a failure.

It will be seen that the decline in invention began about seventeen years ago, and about seven years after the seventeen-year patents began to expire.

In other words, not until inventors began to learn that the Government's contract to protect patentees in the "exclusive" enjoyment of their rights for a period of seventeen years was in some cases insufficient did the decline in inventions set in. In 1886, when the decline set in, seventeen-year patents, for a period of seven years, had expired, and thus the country began to learn of the insufficiency of that term in some cases. Some men object that an extended term may not find the patented device on the market. To which I answer that if one extension has merely resulted in the reduction of the 5 per cent of the failures, the public interests, and justice to the inventor, demand that a further extension should be granted. The writer's view is that the extension of patents is at the risk of the patentee, with the public as a possible beneficiary without any risk or expense.

Some may object that the extension of a patent with a dominating claim serves to limit invention in the line of improvements. My experience is that in making a contract with the owner of a dominating patent the holder of a later subordinate patent for improvement is, as a rule, on an equal footing with, if not better footing than, the owner of the dominating patent, and that the former is as firm in his position as to terms as the latter. The dominating patent, being older, will expire first, and the improvements may be necessary to his machine to enable him to compete with others, etc.

Applications for extensions of patents may be divided into two general classes: First, those in which the inventions have been actually reduced to practice and which may have been placed on the market and have secured a distinct status in trade, although the inventors have not received just remuneration for their inventions; and, second, those in which the inventors, although they have exercised due diligence, etc., have not been able to place their inventions upon the market, but are confident that they would be able to do so provided their patents were extended.

SEC. 152. The right of property which an inventor has in his invention is excelled in point of dignity by no other property right whatever. It is equaled in point of dignity only by the rights which authors have in their copyrighted books. The inventor is not the pampered favorite or beneficiary of the Government or of the nation. The benefits which he confers are greater than those which he receives. He does not cringe at the feet of power nor secure from authority an unbought privilege. He walks everywhere erect and scatters abroad the knowledge which he created. He confers upon mankind a new means of lessening toil or of increasing comfort, and what he gives can not be destroyed by use nor lost by misfortune. It is henceforth an indestructible heritage of posterity. On the other hand, he receives from the Government nothing which costs the Government or the people a dollar or a sacrifice. He receives nothing but a contract which provides that for a limited time he may exclusively enjoy his own. Compared with those who acquire property by devise or inheritance, compared with those who acquire property by gift or marriage, compared with those who acquire property by profits on sales or by interest on money, the man who acquires property in inventions by creating things unknown before occupies a position of superior dignity. Even the man who creates value by manual labor, though he rises in dignity above the heir, the donee, the merchant, and the money-lender, falls in dignity below the author and the inventor. The inventor of the reaper is entitled to greater honor than his father who used the grain-cradle, and the inventor of the grain-cradle is entitled to greater honor than his ancestor who for a hundred generations had used the sickle. Side by side stand the inventor and the author. Their labor is the most dignified and the most honorable of all labor, and the resulting property is most perfectly theirs.

Lord Bacon gave the weight of his opinion to views somewhat similar to the foregoing. The following is a translation of one of his Latin paragraphs:

"The introduction of great inventions appears one of the most distinguished of human actions, and the ancients so considered it; for they assigned divine honors to the authors of inventions, but only heroic honors to those who displayed civil merit (such as the founders of cities and empires, legislators, the deliverers of their country from lasting misfortune, the quellers of tyrants, and the like). And if anyone rightly compare them he will find the judgment of antiquity to be correct, for the benefits derived from inventions may extend to mankind in general, but civil benefits to particular lands alone; the latter, moreover, last but for a time, the former forever." (Walker on Patents, 102, 103.)

It is well understood that the manufacture of a patented improvement is quite as important to the public in carrying out the objects of the patent laws as the inventive act which laid the foundation for the patent. Public policy justifies the extension of a patent if the invention therein disclosed, notwithstanding the diligence of the inventor, has not been placed upon the market and the inventor has failed to secure remuneration for his invention suitable to its value and importance to the public, his failure to secure remuneration being due to circumstances beyond his control. If during the entire term of the patent the invention has not been placed upon the market, either with or without diligence on the part of the inventor, or of an assignee, if no opposition is made to his application for an extension, if no existing trade or business will be injured by giving to the still confident inventor an extension of his patent to enable him to make his invention a part of the actual number of available practical machines in the line of his profession, business, or trade, upon what ground of private or public concern can an extension be refused? Certainly the public will gain nothing by withholding from the inventor the means—an extension of his patent—which would enable him to place his invention on the market instead of allowing it to rest until some one can be found who will have the courage to take it up without the help and protection which a patent affords. In other words, if an inventor with a patent and the natural pride he takes in his invention can not, with due diligence, secure the capital to promote his invention, when may the public reasonably expect that some other person (the inventor no longer having any financial interest in the invention) will undertake to do without the patent that which the inventor was unable to do with a patent, namely, provide the necessary capital to manufacture the improvements and place the same on the markets?

As to whether patents should be extended covering patented devices which have been manufactured and extensively placed upon the market and large amounts realized therefrom, should depend upon the actual profits realized therefrom, including costs of any litigation that may have been necessary, in view of the ascertained novelty of the invention and its commercial value to the trade and the country.

If American manufacturers are to keep up the pace of progress which has enabled them to achieve supremacy in trade, Congress should do what it can to maintain our progress and supremacy, notwithstanding the higher wages which our inventions enable us to pay, by general legislation to assist inventors and patentees to at least keep ahead of the trade of other countries by giving American inventors every possible encouragement to improve and perfect their inventions and place them on the market in actual competition with less meritorious inventions, etc. The importance to this country of this liberal action of Congress toward inventors can not be overestimated. How many millions of dollars would reach this country if a new and improved article were actually placed upon the market? If a single invention may add millions of dollars to the trade of a country under an extended term of patent, how much may result from like extensions in a hundred or two hundred different lines of trade. If only good can result from the extension of a patent in proper cases, why are not extensions granted?

A patent has its foundation upon a contract between the Government and the inventor, in which the inventor undertakes to make such a full, clear, and exact disclosure of his invention as will enable the public to practice his invention with the same facility as the inventor after the expiration of the patent, and the Government undertakes to protect the inventor in the exclusive enjoyment of his rights under the patent in order that he may be enabled to remunerate himself for his time, expense, etc., in perfecting his invention and obtaining his patent. Now, although full and honest disclosure of an invention constitutes the lawful consideration which will support the inventor's right to a patent, it is well known that such disclosure on the part of the inventor is not, in many cases, a consummation of the great object of the patent laws, namely, to actually place the patented improvements upon the market and thereby actually demonstrate the merits of the improvements and develop any possible latent defects.

If the inventor has failed to place the invention upon the market, and thus demonstrate its usefulness and establish a demand for the same, is it not the duty of statesmen to give him an extension of his patent to enable the diligent inventor to fully carry out the great object of the patent laws, namely, the making of inventions and their practical use in commerce?

In a recent paper on "Opportunity and Success," Newell Dwight Hillis said:

"Every new tool that is invented, every new business that is developed, carries with it a hundred new positions and openings for young men."

Robinson on Patents says:

"From an early period the law has taken notice of the fact that during the original term for which the monopoly was granted the inventor may, from circumstances not within his own control, fail to obtain the entire recompense which he deserves; and it has therefore provided, sometimes in one method, sometimes in another, for an extension of the letters patent after the first term has expired." (Sec. 421.)

EXTENSION OF LETTERS PATENT: ORIGIN AND HISTORY OF EXTENSION.

"From the earliest history of patent law the fact has been recognized that through various causes an inventor may fail to obtain an adequate recompense for his inventive skill during the original term of his patent, and that justice to him and a due regard to the public interest may thus sometimes require an extension of his monopoly in the invention. The ancient Crown grants were on this account frequently renewed after the expiration of their original terms, and though for a long period after the statute of James I no such increase of the patent privilege was permitted by the laws of England, yet with the development of industrial enterprise in the first quarter of this century the importance of additional protection to the inventor became so apparent that Parliament in 1835 expressly provided means for extending letters patent, at first for seven and then fourteen years. In this country the propriety of such extensions in special cases has always been conceded the principal variations in our law relating to the tribunal in which the authority to grant extensions should reside. Prior to the act of 1836 this power was lodged in Congress, by whom alone the original term of the monopoly could be prolonged. In 1836 jurisdiction over the renewal as well as the first issue of letters patent was conferred upon the Patent Office, subject to numerous restrictions as to the ground of renewal and duration of the extended term. In 1861 this jurisdiction over extensions was withdrawn as to all patents granted after the passage of that act, and Congress thus became the only source from which an increase of the monopoly created by future patents could be obtained. This is the present state of the law, the Patent Office having authority to renew a patent issued before March 2, 1861, and acting as an examining and advisory tribunal concerning the extension of later patents when the existence of the conditions precedent to such extensions is submitted to its judgment by a special act of Congress. Occasions for the exercise of its former power can not now arise, and an exposition of the current law upon this subject might therefore leave unnoticed those peculiar doctrines which apply only to extensions granted by the office when having general jurisdiction under provisions similar to those of 1836. Inasmuch, however, as Congress may at any time restore this jurisdiction, and when restoring it will probably preserve unchanged the leading characteristics which it previously possessed, this aspect of the law will also be considered in connection with the rules now practically in force." (Sec. 835, vol. 2.)

EXTENSIONS—TO WHOM GRANTED.

"As the sole object of an extension is to furnish to an inventor additional opportunity to secure recompense which he has hitherto failed to obtain, so no extension will be granted unless the inventor is to enjoy at least a substantial portion of its benefits." (Sec. 836, vol. 2.)

"Nor did the liberality of Parliament stop here. The statute of James I had limited the period of the inventor's privilege to fourteen years. This period had always been considered long enough to enable any patentee, who used due diligence in bringing his invention to the knowledge of the public, to gain ample recompense for the cost and labor of inventing it. But such was the appreciation in which these modern lawgivers held the services of the inventor that power was now conferred upon the crown to continue his monopoly for an additional period of seven years, and this was increased in A. D. 1884 to fourteen years." (P. 29, sec. 18, vol. 1; 5 and 6 Will. IV, chap. 83, sec. 4; 7 and 8 Vict., chap. 69.)

"Thus, although at the outset our patent laws were in some important aspects more favorable to the inventor than those of England, the development of the theory that the inventor is necessarily a public benefactor, and that the means adopted for his protection and encouragement are in themselves promotive of the public good, has here as well as there produced its legitimate results in the constant increase of his exclusive privilege and the corresponding limitation of the public rights." (P. 30, sec. 22, vol. 1.)

On the subject of procedure in extension cases referred to the Patent Office by Congress, Professor Robinson says: "Applications for extensions of patents issued since March 2, 1861, must be made to Congress. Such applications may be directly granted or denied without further action, or may be granted subject to the decision of the Commissioner of Patents upon the merits of the application. In the latter cases the proceedings of the Patent Office, except as to the time of their inception, closely resemble those arising under the former law. An application must be filed in the Office, based upon the special act of Congress, a certified copy of which must accompany the application, and the applicant must at the same time furnish a statement under oath of the ascertained value of the invention, and of his receipts and expenditures on its account, giving such facts and data in reference thereto as will enable the Commissioner to form an exact judgment concerning his real profits. Any ambiguity or concealment in this statement is suspicious, and if it is unavoidably defective the reasons for the defect must appear. Upon this application four questions arise: The original patentability of the invention; its value to the public; the sufficiency of the remuneration already received by the inventor; and the effect of an extension upon public interest. On the first point, in uncontested cases, no evidence is necessary. On the second the testimony of disinterested persons must, if possible, be presented, and with such definiteness as to enable the Commissioner to estimate the industrial importance of the device or process covered by the patent. On the third point it must be shown by sufficient proof that the inventor has employed all reasonable means to make his monopoly productive, and that without his fault he has failed to obtain a fair recompense for the time, ingenuity, and expense bestowed on the invention and on its introduction into use. The conclusions of the Commissioner on the fourth point are drawn from the facts disclosed by the preceding inquiries, and from his general knowledge of the condition of the art. The rules of evidence governing this investigation are those established by the Office for other cases in which exterior proof may be required. Any person may oppose an extension by serving notice of his opposition and his reason therefor upon the applicant or his attorney at least ten days before the day fixed for the closing of the evidence, and after such notice will be treated as an adverse party, and entitled to participate in all future proceedings, to offer testimony against the matters asserted by the applicant, and to be heard in argument. After the evidence has closed, the application is referred to the proper examiner for his report and on the proof and arguments of the parties the Commissioner bases his decision, by which the extension is awarded or the application is dismissed." (Sec. 841, vol. 2.)

The progress of the industrial arts is the ground upon which patent laws are framed. A patent may upon its face bear the evidence that it covers an invention that possesses commercial value and does not therefore require practical demonstration of its utility, but there are many inventions that require such demonstration, even to experts, after patents have been issued therefor. This class of cases especially appeals to Congress for more time—for an extension of the patent—to enable the inventors to actually place their patented improvements upon the market. The extended time should be given, public policy says it should be given, if the inventor has been diligent in his efforts to promote his patent, but has failed either to secure proper remuneration for his invention or to place it on a commercial footing.

A late prime minister of England recently said of the United States, "In no other country, I suppose, is there so careful a cultivation of the inventive faculty." And yet in England the extension of a patent for a period of fourteen years may be obtained without the action of Parliament, whereas in the United States no extension can be secured without the action of Congress, which is practically prohibitory, and has been actually so since 1888. Congress has cut off extensions because there were more cases than they could possibly examine in order to select the meritorious ones.

In the memorial to Congress of Eli Whitney, praying for an extension of his patent, he presented a history of the struggles he had been forced to encounter in defense of his right; that he had been unable to obtain any decision on the merits of his claim until after eleven years of litigation and thirteen years of his fourteen years of patent had expired; that his invention had been the source of opulence to thousands of citizens of the United States; that as a labor-saving machine it would enable one man to perform the work of one thousand men, and that it furnishes to the whole family of mankind, at a very cheap rate, the most essential article of their clothing; that he humbly conceived himself entitled to further remuneration from his country, and that he ought to be admitted to a more liberal participation with his fellow citizens in the benefits of his invention; that the very men whose wealth had been acquired by the use of his machines and who had grown rich beyond all former example, had combined their exertions to prevent the patentee from deriving any emolument from his invention; that the State in which he had first made and where he first introduced his machines, and which had derived most signal benefits from it, had paid nothing for the use of the invention; that from no other State had he received an amount equal to one-half a cent per pound on the cotton cleaned with his machines in one year; that estimating the value of the labor of one man at 20 cents per day, the whole amount which had been received by him for his invention was not equal to the value of the labor saved in one hour by his machines then in use in the United States.

"This invention," he proceeds to say, "now gives to the Southern section of the Union, over and above the profits which would be derived from the cultivation of any other crop, an annual emolument of at least $3,000,000," and "then as to the effect on society, the machine, it is true, operates in the first instance on mere physical elements to produce an accumulation and distribution of property." But do not all the arts of civilization follow in the train, and has not he who has trebled the value of land, created capital, rescued the population from the necessity of emigration, and covered a waste with plenty—has not he done a service to the country of the highest moral and intellectual character? Prosperity is the parent of civilization and all its refinements, and every family of prosperous citizens added to a community is an addition of so many thinking, inventing, moral, and immortal natures."

In view of the fact that Eli Whitney, the New England schoolmaster, gave to the South the cotton gin, which has added billions of dollars to the value of her cotton products, while Cyrus McCormick, of Virginia, gave to the North the reaping machine, which added a similar value to her cereal products, it would not require any stretching of the imagination to believe that in the years to come these two sections will again produce something in the line of an invention which will make them common debtors, one to the other, for some great advance in their material progress.

INDUSTRIAL PROGRESS OF GOVERNMENT MEASURED BY THE PROTECTION AND ENCOURAGEMENT GOVERNMENT GIVES TO ITS INVENTORS—AMERICA'S COMMERCIAL SUPREMACY AND HIGH WAGES FOUNDED ON PATENTS.

The following further extracts from the speech of Senator O. H. PLATT of Connecticut (ubi supra), who has repeatedly served as chairman of the Senate Committee on Patents, should be read as presenting some of the views of a distinguished Senator who has been a close student of the patent laws and of their effects upon our industrial development:

The Senate having under consideration the bill (S. 1924) providing for the organization of the Patent Office into an independent Department, and for giving it the exclusive control of the building known as the Patent Office and of the fund pertaining to that office—

"Mr. PLATT said:

" * * * When the fathers wrote that clause into the Constitution of the United States they builded better than they knew. They knew indeed that the prosperity of every nation must depend largely upon the progress of the useful arts. They knew that if this country was to attain the glory and the power which they hoped for it, it must be along the road of invention; but they could not, the wildest dreamer, the statesman with the most vivid imagination could never have dreamed, could never have imagined the blessings, the beneficial results which should flow and have flowed from the exercise of the power thus granted to Congress. The foundations which they then laid of our progress, our welfare, our strength, and our glory were granite, and we have builded wisely upon them; but I think that we may do much to improve the temple which has been reared.

"Mr. President, to my mind the passage of the act of 1836 creating the Patent Office marks the most important epoch in the history of our development—I think the most important event in the history of our Government from the Constitution until the war of the rebellion. The establishment of the Patent Office marked the commencment of the marvelous development of the resources of the country which is the admiration and wonder of the world, a development which challenges all history for a parallel; and it is not too much to say that this unexampled progress has been not only dependent upon but has been coincident with the growth and development of the patent system of this country. Words fail in attempting to portray the advancement of this country for the last fifty years. We have had fifty years of progress, fifty years of inventions applied to the everyday wants of life, fifty years of patent encouragement, and fifty years of a development in wealth, resources, grandeur, culture, power, which is little short of miraculous. Population, production, business, wealth, comfort, culture, power, grandeur, these have all kept step with the expansion of the inventive genius of this country; and this progess has been made possible only by the inventions of its citizens. All history confirms us in the conclusion that it is the development by the mechanic arts, of the industries of a country, which brings to it greatness and power and glory. No purely agricultural, pastoral people ever achieved any high standing among the nations of the earth. It is only when the brain evolves and the cunning hand fashions labor-saving machines that a nation begins to throb with new energy and life and expands with a new growth. It is only when thought wrings from nature her untold secret treasures that solid wealth and strength are accumulated by a people. Especially is this true in a republic. Under arbitrary forms of government kings may oppress the laborer, kings may conquer other nations, may oppress and degrade the men who till the soil, and they may thus acquire wealth; but in a republic it is only when the citizen conquers nature, appropriates her resources, and extorts her riches that you find real wealth and power.

"We witness our development; we are proud of our success; we congratulate ourselves; we felicitate ourselves on all that we enjoy; but we scarcely ever stop to think of the cause of all this prosperity and enjoyment. Indeed, this prosperity has become so common that we expect it. Many men forget to what they owe it; many men, I am sorry to say, in these recent years deny the cause of it all. The truth is, we live in this atmosphere of invention; it surrounds us as does the light and the air; like light and air it is one of our greatest blessings; and yet we pass it by without thought. Some say that the cause of all this wealth, of all this influence in the world, springs from other sources; some say it is the result of our free institutions, of our Christian civilization, of our habits of industry, of our respect for law, of the vastness of our natural resourses, but I say inventive skill is the primal cause of all this progress and growth. I say the policy which found expression in the Constitution of the United States when this clause was enacted giving Congress power 'to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries' has been the policy that has built up this fair fabric.

"Concede all you claim—free institutions, Christian civilization, industrious habits; grant respect for law; acknowledge all our vast natural resources, and then deduct patents and patented inventions from the causes which have led to this development, and you have subtracted from material, yes, from moral, prosperity nearly all that is worth enjoying. Subtract invention from the causes which have led to our growth and our grandeur and you remit us, you remit our people, to the condition of the people of Italy, of Switzerland, of Russia. If 'knowledge is power,' invention is prosperity.

"Is it not apparent that every department of business, every pursuit of organized life, has been fed, nourished, and enabled to keep step in this wonderful march of progress by the patented inventions of the age?

"Now, I want to say that three classes of men have made this possible—first, the inventors; second, the manufacturers; third, the skilled laborers; and by skilled laborers I mean not only the operatives, the mechanics who make the labor-saving machines, but the men who are educated to comprehend the operation of machines and processes.

"I know that it is often acknowledged that the wonderful growth of the country to which I have adverted is the result of invention. I give inventors all the credit that belongs to them, but I want to say that the manufacturers of the country that the artisans of the country have taken part in this wonderful development of its resources, its industries, its wealth, and its population equally with the inventors. It is the manufacturer who has furnished the capital, the enterprise to reduce these inventions to practical application; it is the cunning workmen in the factories that have applied these inventions. The invention of the telegraph was a vast conception, but it has required the manufacturer and the artisan to make that profitable to the country. If it were not for the shop hands and shops of this country there are Senators on this floor who could not go home at the close of this session and return here at the commencement of the next session. Senators who have no very great love for this patent system are here only as the result of it.

"The truth is, and there is no avoiding it, that you can not disconnect in this country invention, manufactures, and agriculture. The triumph and the success of the one is the triumph and the success of all. They are interdependent coequal factors as it were in producing our prosperity and our happiness; and so with regard to the other industries of the country patents are directly connected with them all and absolutely necessary to their successful pursuit. I will not stop to enlarge. * * * That nation which gets most of the world's trade is to be the first power of the globe. Both patriotism and the interests of humanity impel us to say that the United States must have it. How is it to obtain it? It is to be obtained only by encouraging the inventive genius of our citizens by protecting the patent system of the country and all that is involved and comprehended in that system; and as we stimulate the inventive faculty and protect the patent system, we shall steadily reduce the cost of production in this country until we are able to compete with the world, no matter what may be its system of labor. * * * Remember that eight-tenths of the manufacturing of the country is dependent on patented processes.

* * * * * * *

"I know the argument is often used that inventions are opposed to the labor interests of the country. It is not true. There is a redistribution of labor whenever a new labor-saving machine is invented, but there is no descruction of labor. There is no degradation of labor in invention. The man released from a particular kind of labor by the introduction of a labor-saving machine does not go down in the grade and scale of labor, but he ascends. He engages in some higher employment, in some more productive avocation, for patents elevate the laborer. New inventions open new fields of labor. Take printing, take photography, take telegraphy, take gas making, take steam transportation—take all these fields of labor which have been positively created out of nothing by invention, and you will find that the man released from labor in some old occupation by the introduction of machinery which performs his work enters some of these or other new avocations with increased compensation for his labor.

* * * * * * *

"The factory in this country has become the school of the useful arts. Every valuable patent builds a factory, and every factory produces scores of patents; and so the invention and the practical education of our people goes on.

* * * * * * *

"Few men, I believe, have thought of the actual money value of patents. The mind can not measure it. There are few data from which it can be estimated. We may perhaps gather some idea of the money value of patents by seeing what they have cost inventors. The unexpired patents to-day are 235,400, a somewhat larger number than I had supposed when I made the calculation which I am about to submit. I had taken 230,000 as the number of outstanding patents, and they have cost in Government fees $8,000,000; that is to say, the inventors have paid into the Treasury of the United States to obtain those patents $8,000,000. If you allow attorneys' fees at $50 each, there is $11,500,000 more. If you put the time in experimenting and the expense making models at $100 more, and that is vastly too small, it will be $23,000,000 more. So that you will have $42,000,000 as the cost of the title deeds which have been given to the inventors of this country that are now in force. But that is no measure of value. That is the first cost; that is the cost of obtaining. I know that it is difficult to put any average value upon patents; I know that some of them are worth millions and some of them are worth nothing, but I think it would be safe to say that they are worth $500 on an average, and if so, we have as the value of the patented inventions upon that basis, not reckoning cost, $115,000,000, the actual salable value. Others would put the average value of patents very much higher.

"But this, after all, is no way to measure the value of patents. If we measure them by what they create, by what they save in cost, by what they add to production, by their multiplication of values, then the sum total is simply incalculable.

"Let me give you an illustration or two of the saving of patents. I take perhaps as the most marked instance of the saving made by the use of patented inventions the Bessemer steel patent, and I want to say right here that I do not like to have it said that this is the invention of a foreigner alone. I want Americans and American inventors to have their rightful share of credit for this invention. The article known as Bessemer steel was an American invention. It was made by William Kelly, an ironmaster of Eddyville, Ky., and in 1856 and 1857 the Patent Office in an interference between him and Bessemer decided that Kelly was the prior inventor. B. F. Mushet, of England, finally added a further improvement, which rendered it practicable. The first rail of it was laid on the Midland Railroad, in England, in 1857, merely as an experiment. The first works were established here in 1864–65 at Wyandotte, under the Kelly patent, and in 1865 by Winslow, Griswold & Holley, at Troy. The Kelly, Bessemer, and Mushet patents were consolidated in 1866, and work begun in 1868. Good quality was not produced until 1870, when the company producing it failed.

"So much for the history of the Bessemer invention. In 1868 the average price of steel rails was $165 per ton. The price since the commencement of 1884 is $34 per ton. The production of steel rails in 1883 was 1,295,740 tons. The same quantity made in 1868 would have cost more than they cost in 1884 by $168,446,200. That is the saving of a single year as the result of this invention.

"But when we have thus considered the saving in the cost of production we have just begun to consider the saving which is effected by this patent. The entire transportation question of the country has been affected by it. The life of a Bessemer steel rail is double the life of an iron rail; it is more than double, and it is capable of very much harder usage. Now take a single fact as suggesting the saving, aside from that of cost of the production of the steel rail, which has been effected by this patent. In 1868 the freight charge per bushel from Chicago to New York was by lake and canal 25.3 cents, by all rail 42.6 cents. In 1884 by lake and canal it is 9 cents only, and by all rail 17 cents only. Now take the 119,000 miles of railroads in the United States which are used in the transportation of merchandise. Apply that fact to the reduction of the cost of transportation, a large portion of which has resulted directly from the use of the Bessemer steel rail, and tell me if you can estimate, see if you can find the figures which will represent the saving to this nation by reason of the use of this one patented invention.

"Let me take another illustration; and I do this because I hear that the barbed-wire patent has oppressed people; I hear that people who use it are unwilling to pay any royalty for the use of it, and so I cite this illustration to show the saving effected by patents. There have been made and sold from 1874 to 1882, inclusive, of barbed wire for fencing 459,805,000 pounds, which make equal to 1,379,806 miles of post-and-rail fence or 110,384,480 rods. An old board-and-post fence costs $1 per rod, and the barbed-wire fence costs 50 cents per rod. Hence the actual saving to farmers already by this one invention is $55,192,240.

"The total amount of fencing in the United States is estimated at 1,619,195,428 rods. At $1 per rod this would amount to as many dollars; whereas if we had had this invention and could have built all these fences of barbed wire at 50 cents a rod it would have saved the farmers of this country the enormous value of $809,597,714. I take as my authority for the cost of fencing, an agricultural paper published in Iowa, the Iowa Homestead, and in this estimate nothing is included of the saving in the repairs of fences. * * * For my part, I believe that two-thirds of the aggregate wealth of the United States is due to patented inventions. Two-thirds of the $43,000,000,000 which represents the agregate wealth of the United States, in my judgment, rests solely upon the inventions, past and present, of this country. The only way to test the opinion is by imagining the effect upon values which would follow a prohibition of the use of patented inventions.

"Take the expired and unexpired patents; prohibit the application of steam to the creation of power; prohibit the use of patents relating to agriculture and the production of the cereals and of cotton; prohibit the use of the inventions relating to electricity; prohibit the use of inventions relating to printing, and tell me how much you have subtracted from the value of the property of this country? Tell me what the property of the country would be worth with such a prohibition? Then banish the knowledge of them, and tell me how this wealth is to be reproduced.

"Take another instance: Many believe, I fully believe, that Ericsson, a foreigner, but I think an American citizen, by a single invention changed the whole theory of naval architecture, the naval warfare of the world, and prevented this country from dismemberment and disunion. That single invention, originating in the brain of an humble individual, whose invention was not favored by the Government, and who was never, to my knowledge, compensated by the Government, changed the history of the whole world. Consider this one instance of the effect of patents, and tell me what is the value of patented inventions and what they have added to the value of property in this country?

"A distinguished member of the Army told me within a short time that the only reliance of this country in case of war was upon the inventive genius of its people, that it had no Navy, that it had no sufficient Army, that it could only defend itself by a special exercise of the inventive faculty of its citizens in calling into immediate use and power new implements of warfare.

"Is not this vast system of property worth protecting? Does not the patent system attain a dignity which entitles it to fair and generous treatment? Is it not large enough to be independent?

"I have heard it said that we should have all these inventions anyway; that men would have invented without regard to the encouragement which was given to them by our patent laws; that if this exclusive use of their inventions had not been secured to them for a term of years, that if their property in patents were not protected, yet they would have gone on and will go on inventing all the same; that there has been in some way a marvelous birth in this country of inventive capacity, and that it must grow whether it is protected or not.

"Mr. President, it is not true. The inventor is no more a philanthropist than is the agriculturist. He works for his support. He works to achieve a competency. He invents, if you please, to become rich; but he is no more a philanthropist than any other man in any other walk or avocation of life, and you have no right to demand of him that he shall be a mere philanthropist. He is entitled to his reward. He is a laborer entitled to his hire, entitled to it more, if possible, than any other laborer, as his labor is higher in dignity and grandeur than that of any other laborer. I wish on this point to call attention to the testimony of Sir Henry Bessemer as I find it on page 103 of a work called 'Creators of the Age of Steel.' I ask the Secretary to read it."

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"Sir Henry Bessemer is a believer in patents; but to his varied experience in the introduction of new inventions another single fact has to be added. 'I do not know,' he says, 'a single instance of an invention having been published and given freely to the world, and being taken up by any manufacturer at all. I have myself proposed to manufacturers many things which I was convinced was of use, but did not feel disposed to manufacture or even to patent. I do not know of one instance in which my suggestions have been tried; but had I patented and spent a sum over a certain invention, and saw no means of recouping myself except by forcing, as it were, some manufacturer to take it up, I should have gone from one to the other and represented its advantages, and I should have found some one who would have taken it up on the offer of some advantage from me, and who would have seen his capital recouped, by the fact that no other manufacturer could have it quite on the same terms for the next year or two. Then the invention becomes at once introduced, and the public admits its value; and other manufacturers, like a flock of sheep, come in. But the difficulty is to get the first man to move. The first man might say: 'Oh, my machinery cost me a great deal of money; I have my regular trade, and this new scheme is sure to be more trouble to me in the first instance; and when everybody asks for it, every other manufacturer will be in a condition to supply it, so it is not worth my while.' I believe inventions which are at first free gifts are apt to come to nothing."

"Mr. PLATT. The universal testimony of all inventors is that it is the reward which they hope to secure which stimulates their efforts. Is it so that an inventor, of all the men in the world, has no right to his reward? Is it so that he has no right to be protected in his property? It is the security to an inventor of his invention which makes it valuable and which stimulates him in his effort to make new inventions.

NO LIMIT TO HUMAN INVENTION—IT REQUIRES NO PROPHET'S VISION TO SEE THE COMING GLORY AND THE COMING TRIUMPH OF THE INVENTIVE SKILL OF MAN.

"I have heard it argued that we had approached the perfection of the patent system; that there were no new worlds to conquer; that nature had no more secrets to bestow upon mankind for their benefit. So far from this being the case, we stand but in the very vestibule of the great storehouse of nature's secrets. We have but gathered a few pebbles along the shore on which beats a limitless sea. There is no limit to the evolution of human invention until it reaches the realm of the infinite. It requires no prophet's vision to see the coming glory and the coming triumph of the inventive skill of man.

* * * * * * *

"No, Mr. President, every round of the ladder on which we have climbed to national preeminence is a patented invention, and every signboard which points to a greater future of achievement and progress shows that the path continues to lead through the field of invention. We are nearing the end of the contest to which our fathers invited us when they gave to our Government the power to promote the progress of science and the useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries. That contest was for the supremacy of the world, and the prize is now in full view. Shall we forget, shall we neglect the system which has enabled us to outstrip our competitors in the race, or shall we the rather perfect and develop it, that through its perfection and development we may attain still grander results? We stand to-day in the gateway of a most marvelous future. Let us hope that eyes may be given us to see that the inscription over the gate reads, "Protection to the American patent system and all that it comprehends and involves."

Senator PLATT's statement that—reminds me of a reference in Mr. W. C. Dodge's very interesting and instructive essay entitled "Our Country: What it is and What has Made it What it is," from which I quote as follows:

"I have heard it argued that we had approached the perfection of the patent system, that there were no new worlds to conquer, that nature had no more secrets to bestow upon mankind for their benefit. So far from this being the case, we stand but in the very vestibule of the great storehouse of nature's secrets. We have but gathered a few pebbles along the shore on which beats a limitless sea. There is no limit to the evolution of human invention until it reaches the realm of the infinite. It requires no prophet's vision to see the coming glory and the coming triumph of the inventive skill of man"—

"We sometimes hear it said that invention must cease, as the field is already covered. So thought the second examiner appointed in the patent office, who in 1854 resigned his position, giving as his reason for so doing that 'In a little while there will be nothing for the Patent Office to do, as everything is already patented, and I am going to get out of this and engage in some permanent business.'"

The reference to action of the examiner in resigning his position in 1854 for the reason given reminds me of my own impressions of the limits of invention when I was a student in the office of ex-Commissioner Holloway. At this date there were only about 60,000 United States Patents. While considering Mr. Holloway's advice to study patent laws and practice, as it was a growing branch of the law and that it would be useful to me, as a young lawyer, in whatever portion of the country I might locate, it seemed to me that nearly everything had been patented and there would probably not be more than 40,000 more inventions made and patented during my natural life, making a hundred thousand in all. For this reason I did not then attach as much importance to the study of the patent laws as did my distinguished preceptor. However, time has shown that I was as much in error as to future volume of business as the examiner to whom Mr. Dodge has referred, since there are now over 700,000 patents and we are still in the "vestibule of invention."

To show that the benefits of invention extend to all classes of society, that the inventors of some of the greatest and most beneficent inventions have had to overcome opposition, and, apparently, insurmountable obstacles, I quote from Senate Document No. 438, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, prepared by W. C. Dodge, entitled "Our country; what it is and what has made it what it is," as follows:

"It is perfectly clear that our farmers have been as much, if not more, benefited by our patent system and its resulting inventions than any class in the country. In fact, without the labor-saving machines furnished by our inventors and manufacturers they could not compete for a day with their rivals in India, where the British Government has built over 15,000 miles of railroad to connect with the Suez Canal, in order to cheapen and expedite the transportation of wheat to Europe and goods to India; or with Russia, which in like manner is building railroads for the same purpose and where labor costs less than one-fifth of what it does here. * * * When Jaquard invented his loom, which was so wonderful that the great French minister of war, Arnout, caused him to be brought into his presence and said to him: Are you the man who can do what the Almighty can not—tie a knot in a stretched string?—there was the strongest opposition to its introduction, culminating in a mob of the silk weavers, who took it from his house into the streets, broke it up, and burned the fragments.

"It was the same with Kay, who invented the flying shuttle, driven by the picker staff, in 1733, and which doubled the capacity of the hand loom; of Hargreaves, who invented the spinning jenny; of Arkwright, who invented the spinning frame; of Crompton, who invented the mule spinner, and Cartwright, who invented the power loom, and who spent $150,000 in the effort to protect his patents. All of them had their machines destroyed by the ignorant mobs, and Hargreaves and Arkwright had to fly for their lives. Kay was ruined by expensive lawsuits in the effort to protect his patent from infringement by wealthy and unscrupulous parties, and when the mob destroyed his machine he barely escaped with his life to France, where he died in poverty.

"These inventions, with that of the cotton gin by Whitney, who was outrageously defrauded of his rights, have changed the entire art of producing woven fabrics. Indeed, so far as the cotton industry of the world is concerned, they may be said to have created the industry which to-day gives employment to millions, and has so immensely cheapened the product that it is used the world over.

"The biographer of Eli Whitney said of him: 'This inventor actually created both personal and national wealth.'

"Palissy, the Huguenot potter, impoverished his family and starved himself nearly to death ere he discovered the secret of the famous enamel which afterwards made him rich and famous. He died in a dungeon, however, from political and religious persecution, at the advanced age of 80 years.

"Goodyear reduced himself, not only to poverty, but to isolation before his grand success. One witness testifies:

"'I found in 1839 that they had not fuel to burn nor food to eat, unless it was sent in to them.'

"Jethro Wood, the inventor of the modern iron plow, and of whom Hon. W. H. Seward said, 'I am fully satisfied that no citizen of the United States has conferred greater economic benefit on his country than Jethro Wood; none of her benefactors have been more inadequately rewarded;' and of whom Daniel Webster said, 'I regard Jethro Wood as a public benefactor, and I would unite in any proper measure for the benefit of his family,' was defrauded of all benefit from his patent by infringers, who availed themselves of the provision then in the patent law that if used in public before it was patented the patent was void; the public use in his case consisting simply of his trial of the plow in the field where his neighbors saw it.

"And when in recent years a bill was passed by a two-thirds vote in the House to provide for his four indigent daughters, it was defeated in the Senate on the last night of the session by the single vote of a prominent Senator, who said if Congress wanted to pass such a bill it should do so for the heirs of Fulton, who had never received a cent, when the record shows that in 1846 Congress gave to the heirs of Fulton $75,000.

"Morse struggled for years to secure attention to his telegraph invention; at times he had but a single meal in twenty-four hours; and when at last a bill was reported to appropriate $30,000 to build an experimental line from Washington to Baltimore it met with opposition and ridicule, one high official, to show his contempt of the project, proposing that half of the sum should be used in mesmeric experiments. And even after the bill had passed the House by 8 majority a friendly Senator advised him: 'Give it up, return home, and think no more of it.' And when, with a heart made sick by 'hope deferred,' he called for his bill as he retired for the night, he found that after paying the same he would have but 37½ cents left. But, fortunately for him and the world, as he rose in the morning a woman brought him the 'glad tidings' that near midnight the Senate had passed the bill. To him she was truly 'an angel of light,' and it was, indeed, appropriate that she was selected by Morse to send over the first completed line that equally appropriate first message: 'What hath God wrought?'

"These, and others like them, were indeed the 'martyrs of invention'—men who devoted their lives to producing inventions which have done more for the progress, comfort, and happiness of the human race than any other class of men that ever lived.

"It was years after Nasmyth invented his steam hammer before he could induce the Government to even try it; but when he did get a trial, his hammer drove down a pile 90 feet long and 18 inches square in four and one-half minutes, while by the old method the workmen were twelve and one-half hours driving a similar one.

"When the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad was opened with horse cars, in 1830, Daniel Webster expressed grave doubts as to the possibility of railroads, saying, among other things, that the frost on the rails would prevent the train from moving, or from being stopped if it did move.

* * * * * * *

TO INVENTORS WE MUST LOOK FOR MAINTENANCE OF HIGH WAGES OVER CHEAP FOREIGN LABOR.

"With the illustrations herein given of the benefits of our patent system, one would suppose that opposition to patents would long since have ceased; but, unfortunately, while it has greatly diminished with the growth of intelligence and universal education, it still exists, and the strangest fact of all is that the strongest opposition in the United States has come from the farmers, who have been so benefited by it.

"That the 'drive well' patents saved the farmers of the country from twenty-two to twenty-five million dollars, since said invention reduced the cost of a well from $50 or $60 to $20 or $25; that it is practically clear that our farmers have been as much, if not more, benefited by the patent system and its resulting inventions as any class in the country.

"Since 1870 our export of wheat has averaged 124,000,000 bushels, and in the year ending June 30, 1892, it reached 226,206,331 bushels, over one-third of the entire crop. Now, whether or not we can sell a bushel abroad depends upon our ability to place it on the foreign dock within 1 cent of a given price; because, if we can not deliver it there as cheaply as they can buy it from the Black Sea region, and now from Argentina, India, and Russia, where labor costs but $30 a year, of course they will not buy of us.

"Suppose we were to strike out of existence the dozen or more leading inventions used in the preparation of the soil, the seeding, harvesting, thrashing, storing, and transporting of the wheat crop of the country, and go back to the old-time methods of hand labor; the result would be that we could not sell a bushel, because it would cost so much that we could not deliver it in Europe as cheaply as our competitors could.

"Or, if the amount exported was retained at home and added as it would be to the home supply, what then would wheat be worth? Why, it would not pay the cost of raising it, and all engaged in wheat growing would be ruined. The farmers under such a condition would be thrown back where they were in the early days of Illinois, as recently described by one of them in a leading agricultural paper published in Chicago, in which he says he spent a week taking 20 bushels of wheat with an ox team over 90 miles to Chicago, through the sloughs and mud, and sold it for 40 cents per bushel, and took his pay in brown sugar at 15 cents per pound and coarse cotton cloth at 25 cents per yard.

"There is not a man in the United States whose memory goes back forty years who does not know that, contemporaneously with the grand march of applied science, the condition of labor has improved. The introduction of labor-saving machinery has always had its opponents. Their predictions of disaster have been sounding ever since the first cotton-spinning machine was invented. They have incited some of the ignorant and credulous to riots for the destruction of machinery as the deadly foe of man.

"But as years have passed on, the intelligent workingmen of this country have learned that invention, instead of enslaving them, has been their best friend. They have shorter day's work, more comfortable and wholsome places to work in, better homes, better food, better clothing, better schools, and in all ways a larger return for their work. Not only that, but American laborers are far better paid than European.

The following extracts are from the annual reports of the Commissioner of Patents to the Congress of the United States.

[Samuel S. Fisher's report, O. G., vol. 1, p. 8.]

"It must, however, be borne in mind that many good inventions are not developed for the want of means; many are laid aside because, although good and useful, they are in advance of the art to which they belong. The protection afforded by the patent and the hope of reward have proved the incentives to invention.

"They do not deem it too much that the Patent Office, which is the only institution which they can properly call their own, and which they have built up with their money and established by their genius, shall be supplied upon a liberal scale with every appliance for the performance in the best manner of all legitimate duties."

[C. E. Mitchell's report, O. G., vol. 50, p. 716.]

"But the territories of American invention know no Pacific Sea. Their farther bounds expand as their hither borders are occupied. Illimitable in extent and inexhaustible in resources, they will yield up unimagined treasures of invention in all the coming centuries, just as they have done in the hundred years of marvels whose recorded story, drawing toward its close, is at once the tribute and the glory of the American patent system."

[W. E. Simonds's report, O. G., vol. 62, p. 899.]

"A vastly large number of inventions are of a greater value than the public dreams, and those which seem to fall dead contain within them the seeds of suggestion, which later lives and grows to rich fruition."

[A. P. Greely's report, O. G., vol. 82, p. 1918.]

"It is to the stimulus to invention given by our patent system that the greatest increase in our exports is largely due, and it is on American invention, as fostered and stimulated by the patent system, that we may confidently depend for ability to maintain the high rates of wages to American workmen and yet compete successfully in the markets of the world with nations where the workman receives but meager return for his labor."

REASONABLE REQUESTS OF INVENTORS AND MANUFACTURERS SHOULD BE HEEDED.

[C. H. Duell's report, O. G., vol. 86, p. 1178.]

"At the present time, when our manufacturers are reaching out for foreign markets, I believe no greater aid can be given them than by fostering and stimulating invention."

Let us not forget that it is the American inventors who by their inventions and discoveries "have made the last fifty years of the nineteenth century the most remarkable of recorded time," and at the same time have laid the civilized world under tribute to American manufacturers.

In return for all this our inventors only ask for a fair field and fair treatment. An enlightened public sentiment demands that their requests should be considered with favor by the Congress of the United States.

[Patent Centennial Celebration, p. 480.]

The late Commissioner Fisher was reported to have said: "No class of our citizens have done more for the glory and prosperity of the nation than the inventors and mechanics of the United States, and they have never been favored children.

"What is now needed is the perfection of the system, better and more complete means for carrying it on, and more effectual means for protecting the inventor."

In an address by Hon. John Goode before the Sons of the American Revolution, in which he was introduced as "the Nestor of the American bar and one of Virginia's most notable sons," he said inventors had contributed more to the welfare of their fellows, in that period (referring to the last fifty years), than Alexander, Cæser, or Napoleon, and their names would survive when those of the great conquerors had passed into oblivion. They have subdued steam; they have harnessed and controlled that subtle spirit, electricity; they courted coy nature; they have anihilated time and space with the telegraph and telephone. In future years the names of great soldiers will shine but dimly beside the names of Fulton, Morse, and Henry.

In order to show the appreciation of inventors of the dignity of their calling and of their claims upon the consideration of their fellow-countrymen by legislators, statesmen, civil officers, men of science, men who have achieved distinction as authors, and men who are in touch with our commercial development, I have prepared the following extracts for publication:

Prof. Alexander Graham Bell, the inventor of the telephone, in assuming the chair as president of the Centennial Convention, said, in substance, that the inventor may be described as one who is never satisfied with things as they exist, or as he finds them, that therefore he is constantly straining to make improvements. Sir William Bessemer said: "I spent four years of time and $20,000 in gold before I was able to produce a pound of steel. I was not a manufacturer of steel, but I knew that there was a big stake to play for if I could succeed. I would not have spent a farthing in the effort had it not been for the hope of recouping myself under my patent, because if, when I had made it a success, others could step in and avail themselves of it, they would have had $20,000 and four years' time the advantage of me."

Commissioner of Patents Holt:

"The class of men who have given to their native land and to the world these grand inventions, whose beneficent influences tell with measureless power upon every pulsation of our domestic, social, and commercial life, are indeed public benefactors, and may well be pardoned for believing that their wants should not be treated with entire indifference by that body which represents alike the intellect and heart, as it does the material interests of the great country of which they are citizens—the Congress of the United States."

Says Hon. R. Q. Mills:

"All wealth is created by labor, and the greatest wealth is created when the greatest sum of products is produced in a given time; and that is done when the labor works in harmony with nature and the auxiliaries which the inventive genius of man has supplied. We use labor-saving machinery and make our labor more productive than any other people."

Says Professor Thurston:

"There has never been in the history of the world a more impressive illustration of the value to a nation of that generous public policy, that just legislation, which gave to the man of brain the control of the products of his mind than is shown by the progress of the United States under her patent system. The genius of invention is the mainspring of advance in our material civilization, the foundation of that prosperity on which culture must rest for its solid support."

Said Carroll D. Wright, Commissioner of Labor:

"There is something peculiarly educational in the very presence of the working of mechanical power—the witnessing of the automatic movement of a machine stimulates thought."

Senator DANIEL, of Virginia, has said:

"The inventor has redeemed us from the curse of poverty, dissipated the mysteries of humbug, and destroyed the monopoly of knowledge. He is compelling peace by making war too terrible to tamper with. The world has grown wise enough to know that with every invention that saves labor luxury is laid at the feet of the toiler, and skillful hands and brains are released from menial tasks for others more exalted."

Said Hon. Benjamin Butterworth, Commissioner of Patents:

"But for the patent system only an infinitesimal part of the triumph of inventive genius would have been accomplished, and if we would cut the ground from beneath the material prosperity of the age, there is no way in which this could be more effectively done than by the repeal of our patent laws."

Says Senator VEST:

"The cheapening processes of new inventions everywhere are progressing, until now everything is cheapened. Human inventions, new modes, new devices, intelligent skill in producing everything, have brought down prices everywhere."

Says Senator O. H. PLATT:

"Every comfort which we have, every convenience which we enjoy, every element of wealth which we acquire has its root and development in the patent system of this country. They are born of patents, and they live only by permission of patents."

As Hon. CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW recently said:

"The wildest dreamer of even five years ago would not have predicted that the products of our factories and mills could compete in their own markets with the manufactures of the Old World. But the carpets of Yonkers are being sold at Kidderminster, the rails of Pittsburg are being laid down in Liverpool, and the great bridge which Holland is to build over one of its inland seas was captured by an American firm against all European competition as to price, though denied the Americans from patriotic motives.

"The alarm over the competition of American goods has been sounded in the Austrian, German, and French Parliaments by their far-sighted statesmen. Its restiveness is felt in the public opinion of Great Britain. Our democracy produces a skill and ambition in our artisans by which they do more and better work in eight hours than their European competitors in ten. Our inventive genius is constantly evolving better and more economical methods of production, and the machine of to-day is cast aside at once by the enterprising Yankee for the better one of to-morrow, while his European rival clings to the old machine until it is worn out. Our low rates for transportation, which are less than half those of European countries, have annihilated space. They have brought our cheap raw material alongside our improved methods and our more intelligent artisans, and are carrying the product to our seaboard and the markets of the world.

"For the twentieth century the mission of the United States is peace; peace, that it may capture the markets of the world; peace, that it may find the places where its surplus products not only of food, but of labor, can meet with a profitable return."

"The Western farmer may know it not, but the inventor of the compound marine engine is possibly the best friend he ever had, and that farmer will find his reward in ascertaining for himself what its effects in cheapening transportation across the ocean has been upon his fortunes. Another example: A single generation ago our carpets were made for us by foreign hands, and the prices were excessive. A great American inventor produced the Bigelow carpet loom; building upon the faith of an American patent, a million dollars in one instance, and a million and a half were risked in the experiment. The result to-day is that our carpets cost but one-third of what they did, and less than one-hundredth of them are made by foreign looms. Had there been no patent law, these millions would never have been risked in the experiment so rich in result to the American people. If to-day the sewing machine were produced for the first time and we had no patent law, its inventor would hawk it in vain up and down the land to find that foolish man who would risk a half a million in its commercial development, with the certainty that success would invite ruinous competition.

"If there be one class of men above all others to whom the American nation and the American people are in debt, it is to American inventors. Why not grant them the poor boon of expending for their benefit the moneys they pay?"

[Robert H. Thurston, A. M., LL. D., director and professor of mechanical engineering, Sibley College, Cornell University. Patent Centennial Celebration, 1891.]

"Boulton and Watt, the capitalist, with the inventor, gave the world the steam engine, finally, in such form and in such numbers that its permanent establishment as the servant of man was insured. The capitalist was as essential an element of success as was the inventor, and in this instance, as in a thousand others, the race is indebted to that much-abused friend of the race, the capitalist, for much that it enjoys of all that it desires. The industry and patience, the skill and the wisdom required for the accumulation of this energy stored for future use in great enterprises is as important, as essential, as inventive power or any other form of genius. Talent and genius must always aid each other. This firm was established in 1764, and its main resources, aside from the bank account, were Watt's patent, about expiring, and Watt's genius, and Boulton's talent as a man of business. The patent was extended for twenty-four years. The new inventions of Watt, now beginning to pour from his prolific brain in a wonderful stream, were also patented, and the whole works were soon employed upon the construction for which numerous orders had begun to pour in upon the now prosperous builders. The patent law established Boulton & Watt, and the firm paid back the nation with handsome usury, giving it unimaginable profits indirectly through its control of the work of the world, and large profits, indirectly, through the business brought them from all parts of the then civilized globe. There has never, in the history of the world, been a more impressive illustration of the value to a nation of that generous public policy, that simply just legislation, which gives to the man of brain control of the products of his mind. For a hundred years Great Britain has, largely through her encouragement of the inventor and her protection of his mental property, by securing the fruits of his labor, in fair portion, to him, gained the power of dictating to the world, and has gained an advance that can not be measured. Watt and Arkwright and Stephenson and Crompton and their ilk, protected by the Government and its patent laws, made their country the peaceful conquerors of the world. The story of the work of the invention is a poem of might, meaning, and wonderful deed. The inventor proved himself a mightier magician than ever the world has seen.

"Since the days of Watt, the improvement of the steam engine and the work of inventors has been confined to matters of detail. But these matters of detail had been found to involve opportunities to make enormous strides in the direction of securing improved efficiency of the machine. The further application of the principle which led Watt to his greatest invention—of the principle keep the cylinder as hot as the steam which enters it; of that which he enunciated relative to the advantage of expanding steam, and of that effecting the regulation of the machine—have reduced the costs of steam and of fuel to a small fraction of their earlier magnitude. One ton of engine to-day does the work of eight or ten in the time of Watt; one pound of fuel or steam gives to-day ten times the power then obtained from it. A steamship now crosses the Atlantic in one-eighth the time required by the famous 'liner' of the 'Black Ball Line.' The wastes of the engine have been brought down from above 80 per cent to 8; and a half ounce of fuel on board ship will now transport a ton of cargo over a mile of ocean."

"So we see that each invention, great or small, by its own inherent force and power wonderfully stimulates and increases the inventive or creative faculty of man. * * * If they can but discover the germs of new inventions which are to cheapen production, which are to minister to the present and prospective wants of mankind, they will be satisfied with their life work and feel that they are entitled to a place among the world's great doers, though others shall enter in and reap more abundantly the money reward."

"We stand in the doorway of a new century. What of the future? Has invention reached its zenith? Has man maintained his highest development? Has he already reached the goal of human progress? Can he advance no further? I ask these questions because I firmly believe the limit of human invention is also the limit of human advancement; that he who writes the history of invention will write the history of mankind; that if invention has already done its perfect work, man is all he can ever hope to be in this life."

"Wyatt did not succeed either in making his fortune or in introducing his machine into use. He lacked pecuniary means, but could not hold out long enough to realize the success which his genius merited; but, more than all, as often happens with many advanced inventions—inventions made in advance of the times—he lacked the time and the attendant circumstances, with all their subtle influences, which accompanied the train of inventions relating to spinning and weaving which came into use a generation or so after Wyatt's time. His invention slumbered for thirty years, until it was rediscovered, or, what is just probable, until its principles came accidentally to the knowledge of Arkwright, who, previous to 1769, had been a barber at Preston. These primitive efforts—that of John Kay, who in the invention of the fly shuttle, and that of John Wyatt, in the invention of spinning machines where rollers were used—formed the germs from which sprang that great line of inventions which has revolutionized industry, and whose influence upon labor has been so widely marked in every direction."

"But the essentials of human happiness are not found in mere form of government. Personal liberty, a fair chance in the race of life, under the protection of equal laws, are all that is fundamental. The wants of man—the animal, to be fed, clothed, and housed; the higher wants of man—homo, to learn, read, think, travel, communicate, and receive—it is in the ample supply of these that the greatest sum total of human happiness is to be found. And in these this age and this country surpass all others."

"We do not often stop to think how and whence our blessings come. We accept them with a dim sense of gratitude to somebody or something as a flower smiles its thanks to the sunshine. But in the light of the reflections which this occasion suggests we can realize how faintly, how vast is the obligation which we owe to the inventors of America. Not a garment that we wear, not a meal that we eat, not a paper that we read, not a tool that we use, not a journey that we take, but makes us a debtor to some American inventor's thought. Measured by what we can learn, see, do, and enjoy in a lifetime, we live longer than Methuselah, we are wiser than Solomon, richer than Crœsus, and greater than Alexander. Archimides has found his fulcrum; it is the brain of the inventor.

"We can realize, too, to-day how wise the fathers were beyond anything they could have known in providing in the Constitution for the encouragement and reward of invention. On twenty-seven words—only twenty-seven words—in that great charter the American patent system rests. What other twenty-seven words ever spoken or penned have borne such fruits of blessing for mankind."

"The Romans of old assigned the highest places in the Elysian fields to him who had improved human life by the invention of arts, and sure our own race—the most inventive of men, and our own country, the most inventive of nations—will not refuse the highest honors to those creative minds which have contributed so much to make it foremost of mankind."

"Put your ideas into material form, and we will guarantee you the exclusive right to multiply and sell your books or your machines for a term long enough to secure a fair reward to you and to your children; after that period we want your monopoly, with its individual benefits, to cease in favor of the greatest good of all."

"As stated by W. C. Church, the biographer of Ericsson, it is now possible to carry across the Atlantic 2,200 tons of freight with 800 tons of coal, where in 1870 it was only possible to carry 800 tons of freight with 2,200 tons of coal.

"This is the result, it need scarcely be said, of the substitution of the screw propeller for the paddle wheel, of surface condensation, of high pressures, and double, triple, and quadruple expansion; each of them a successive step, resulting in such growth that steamers now plow on every sea, and their aggregate tonnage is nearly as large as that of the sailing vessels."

"Such a state of things is repugnant to human sense of justice. The same conception of the rights of the inventor that had found expression in the Constitution of the United States and of the French Republic forced thinking men to the conclusion that the rights in question could not be bounded by geographic lines, but that the protection of the inventor should be coextensive with the benefits he has conferred upon mankind. Hence the idea of international protection."

"Every invention of any importance is the nursery of future inventions, the cradle of a sleeping Hercules.

"It was not primarily to benefit the individual, but to promote the progress of science and useful arts that this power was conferred, in order that the whole nation might have the benefit of this progress—the benefit of the individual being merely an inducement to him to devote his time, labor, thought, and means to aid in the accomplishment of this desired result of progress by making new inventions."

Before Japan enacted its patent law, dated March 1, 1899, it appointed Mr. Karekiyo Takahashi a special commissioner to the United States to gather data obtainable in regard to our patent system as practiced at that date. The Commissioner of Patents directed the officers in his Bureau to give Mr. Takahashi every facility in their power to aid him in gathering facts available at our Patent Office, etc. In conversation with one of the principal examiners Mr. Takahashi was asked why the people of Japan desired to have a patent system.

"I will tell you," said Mr. Takahashi; "you know it is only since Commodore Perry in 1854 opened the ports of Japan to foreign commerce that the Japanese have been trying to become a great nation like other nations of the earth, and we have looked about us to see what nations are the greatest, so that we could be like them; and we said, 'There is the United States, not much more than one hundred years old, and America was not discovered by Columbus yet four hundred years ago;' and we said, 'What is it that makes the United States such a great nation?" And we investigated and we found that it was patents, and we will have patents." Examiner Pierce, to whom the above statement of Mr. Takahashi was made, in commenting thereon said, "Not in all history is there an instance of such unbiased testimony to the value and worth of the patent system as practiced in the United States.

Senator PLATT has said that "the passage of the act of 1836 creating the Patent Office marks the most important epoch in the history of our development. I think the most important event in the history of our Government from the Constitution until the war of the rebellion."

For "this masterful stroke of statesmanship" (the act of 1836) the country is indebted to Mr. Ruggles, of Maine. This act contained five new, special, and salient features, namely: Section 7, providing for preliminary examinations; section 10, giving the executor of a deceased inventor the right to apply for a patent; section 12, giving the right to file a caveat for an incomplete invention; section 13, providing for the reissue of a defective or invalid patent, and section 18, providing for the extension of patents.

It will be seen that each one of these salient features was in the line of benefiting, and thereby encouraging, the inventor. Section 7 served to establish his prima facie right to the invention, in the event of his securing a patent; section 10, to give him the assurance that in case he made an invention, but should die before securing a patent, his legal representatives would be entitled to apply for and receive the patent; section 12 provided that if the nature of the invention was such that much time would be required to complete an invention, or if for any other cause the inventor deserved more time within which to file his formal application for letters patent, he might secure himself against the issue of a patent, without notice to him, by placing a caveat in the secret archives of the Patent Office; section 13 provided that if through the incompetency of any attorney, or other cause, his patent were defective or invalid, he could reissue the same; and section 18—see copy of same in full in digest of laws herein—gave a patentee, upon conditions therein set forth, the right to an extension of his letters patent.

Notwithstanding the fact that section 18 was regarded as equal in importance to any other section, it is the only section of those above named in that "masterful stroke of statesmanship" which has been repealed. I have fully set forth herein how the repeal was secured, namely, by the mere action of a conference committee, without the same having ever been suggested to anyone and without any consideration in either the House or Senate previous to the report of the conference committee, though, as I have explained, the "masterful stroke of statesmanship" would have carried it through, in view of the many reforms and improvements embraced therein, however objectionable the repealing of section 18 might have been to even a majority of Congress. The marvel of it all is that this "step in the wrong direction" has been allowed to stand in view of the fact that the mistake began to appear clearly in 1878, when the first seventeen-year patents began to expire. We have been in the presence of the constant admonition of its mischievous effects upon the useful arts ever since 1886, about six years after the seventeen-year patents began to expire. How long will the country have to wait to have this legislative mistake corrected?

For the benefit of my legal brethren who are so persistently urging, in view of the provisions of section 7 of the act of 1836, that preliminary injunctions should be issued more frequently under the legal presumption which the official examination provided for in said section 7 was intended to establish in favor of the holder of a patent, I quote, in support of such contention, from the report to Congress of Hon. D. P. Holloway, who invited the writer to become a student in his office soon after he resigned his position as Commissioner of Patents, as follows:

"But I feel confident that, as the general result of our system, its benefits have accrued no less to the unsuccessful than to the successful applicants; that while the latter have secured patents to which an intrinsic value has been imparted by the scrutiny to which inventions have been subjected, and by the sanction of the office are comparatively protected from infringement and litigation, the former have been saved from waste of time, labor upon well-known machines, and from the cost and misery of defending in courts of law rights to which they can maintain no title." (Patent Office Report, Vol. I, 1853, p. 17.)

I think my old preceptor, long since gone to his final reward, would turn over in his grave if he could visit the world and witness the present disposition of motions for preliminary injunctions.

At a special meeting of the Patent Law Association of Washington, called to consider this very subject of the extension of patents, one of the honored guests, Professor Robinson, when requested to speak on the subject of extension of patents, said in substance that it was within the experience of each one of us (the meeting was one of the largest ever held by the association) that in some cases, from one cause or another, over which the inventor has no control and for which he is not responsible, and therefore, through no fault of his own, the inventor fails to receive a due reward for his invention during the original term of his patent; that in such cases he had never been able to understand why an inventor, whose genius is of as high an order as that of an author, should be limited to seventeen years when an author can get twenty-eight years under a copyright.

In Robert Fulton, by Thurston, we have read that "Joffra, who experimented on the rivers of France twenty-five years before Fulton, might, with similar encouragement, have met with equal success. Yet, although Fulton was not, in any true sense, the pioneer inventor of the steamboat, his success in the work of introducing, developing, that miracle of modern times can not be overestimated" in its value and importance to the people.

Fulton was an inventor, but not the first inventor, but his marble statue would not have been placed in Statuary Hall by the State of Pennsylvania, as one of two statues that a State is allowed to place therein, if Joffra had received the same financial and legislative assistance in France which Fulton received in America twenty-five years after Joffra's invention. Thousands of cases like these might be cited to show that public interests would be promoted and the wealth of an entire nation increased by giving an inventor time to promote his patent and actually place the patented improvement on the market and available to the public. An extended patent costs the Government nothing, while the effect of giving the extension may be to benefit the nation.

Inventions point the way to new manufactures; patents lead to the promotion of new manufacturing plants, and the establishing of manufacturing plants increases the demand for labor and raw material, tends to increase the value of real estate, and to generally increase the wealth of a community in which new establishments are located. If the above doctrine is based upon sound principles of political economy, why should not the people of every town, of every county and State, and of the entire country be in favor of a law which, if enacted, would not only tend to increase, but would surely increase and develop, manufacturing in all parts of the country and enlarge both our domestic and our foreign trade?

If the extension of a patent enables a patentee to obtain capital and place his device on the market, no one will be injured thereby except those who have inferior articles. But we must not forget that the great object of the patent laws is to substitute, in whole or in part, superior for inferior articles, even though the makers of the latter may be injured.

Senator PLATT has said:

"Remember that eight-tenths of the manufacturing of the country is dependent on patented processes. * * * The factory in this country has become the school of the useful arts. Every valuable patent builds a factory, and every factory produces scores of patents, and so the invention and the practical education of our people goes on."

General Leggett, former Commissioner of Patents, in an address before a convention of manufacturers and inventors, said: "Nine-tenths of all the capital invested in manufacturing was so invested by reason of its having patent protection."

Said Acting Commissioner of Patents William H. Doolittle: "It may be safely said that two-thirds of the manufacturing interests of the country are based upon patents, and the welfare of all such interests are intimately connected with the welfare of the patent system."

May we not conclude that the establishment of manufacturing plants is a guide to the number of patents which any given community or State controls, and that therefore if we are advised as to the number of available patents that are taken out in different sections of a country we can ascertain the comparative growth of manufacturing concerns therein.

One reply which the writer received in answer to the question, "Should the Commissioner of Patents be again empowered to grant an extension of the term of a seventeen-year patent by reenacting in substance the law of 1836?" was as follows:

"Yes, decidedly. Such law should be unquestionably reenacted, in my opinion, as a matter of simple justice to the inventor. If the inventor is powerless, through lack of means or other reason, to commercially introduce his invention despite all possible efforts he may put forth, he is certainly in no condition to go to the enormous expense and incur the uncertainties of an appeal to Congress to extend his term, which is the only alternative he now has. There should be no difficulty in framing a law of this nature that would amply protect the class of inventors for which it is intended. A little reflection will show that the fixing of an equal term for all patents, while perhaps a necessary step for sake of uniformity and in issuing the original grant, is nevertheless on its face highly illogical. Some inventions may be immediately adopted and have a vogue of but one or two years, a matter in which the inventor may fully realize and understand in advance.

"Another and perhaps far more important class of inventions, of which numerous examples both past and present will suggest themselves, may not come into use, despite all efforts of the patentee, and it is this class of inventions for which a liberal extension law is chiefly needed. Among these inventions I include those of a highly original and fundamental type, which may form a new departure on previous and well-settled practice; or, again, inventions that are ahead of their time, or which require the art to grow up to a point where they can be successfully utilized; or those that from their very nature require the investment and risk of a large amount of money before even a practical demonstration of the advantages claimed by the inventor can be had; or such inventions that can be used only by some existing monopoly, such as a government, a railroad, telegraph, or telephone corporation, whose interests, or fancied interests, may lie in throttling the invention, etc. Many of these classes of inventions are of a nature that eventually confer the greatest possible benefit to the world at large, yet those who are responsible for their creation, and have struggled for years to secure a favorable hearing, and have suffered all sorts of privations in their efforts to benefit themselves and their fellow-men, are not only left without substantial reward but are often deprived of the credit and fame which an adoption of their ideas during the lifetime of their patents might have given to them. Indeed, such an inventor may deem himself fortunate if the training of the public mind or the growth of the art has been sufficiently rapid as to cause his invention to be adopted, or to come into use in a tentative way during the last year or two of the life of his patent.

"The objection with respect to the uncertainties in the public mind as to the date when a given patent will expire and the invention become public property is, in my mind, entirely wrong in principle. As a matter of fact, it is to this certainty of the date of expiration that places the inventor at the mercy of manufacturing monopolies or operating corporations. If a certain invention is valuable to them, intending manufacturers or users should be obliged to negotiate with the patentee and not await his death or the death of his patent.

"Of course if an inventor has derived a reasonable profit during his tenure of the exclusive right conferred by his patent, an extension of it should be barred, and this is a matter that can very easily be determined. The fees and expenses incident to the procuring of such extension should be made as low as possible in justice to the class of inventors or their heirs who are in need of and are entitled to the benefit of this provision. I am firmly of the opinion that such a law is not only eminently just both to the patentee and the public, but that it will be found in practice to greatly encourage inventors and aid them in procuring financial assistance which the Government itself can not supply, and of which they are as a class so greatly in need, and that it will bring about a much greater degree of activity in the lines of original research and in the production of inventions that greatly benefit the world.

Extensions were never granted, as is well known to those who practiced on extension cases, except for the benefit of the inventor and the public in general, even when the inventor had assigned his entire right to the patent and any extension thereof; the Commissioner would not extend the patent except upon proof that the inventor would thereby become a substantial beneficiary either by reassignment of the patent or an execution of a contract which, upon its face, would make the extension inure largely to the benefit of the inventor. It was not safe to ask for an extension unless the proofs came up to the standard above indicated. As the application for an extension had to be made by the inventor, it will be seen that he held command of the field, that terms satisfactory to him must be made or he would not make the application. It was not safe to even try to take advantage of the inventor in making the contract; it would endanger the rejection of the application by the Commissioner on the ground that the terms were not as favorable to the inventor as they should be in view of the estimated value of the extended term. Again, as the extension had to be granted, if at all, before the patent expired, and as the Commissioner might not take the case up until the patent was about to expire, it will be seen that it would be too late to patch up a new agreement with the inventor in order to avoid rejection of the application on the ground that the inventor would not participate sufficiently in the benefits of the extension.

In the disposition of all applications for inventions that had not gone into commercial use, as well as all cases in which the inventor had not assigned his patent, the interests of the inventor and the public only were considered.

In answer to the argument that if a general extension law were passed some inventor might now and then secure an extension who, in the opinion of some, was not entitled thereto, it may be said that if this is a good ground against the proposed law, it is equally good against every other court, commission, or board in the land. We do not, from a consideration of a possible abuse, disband our courts, wipe out all civil laws, and live in the primitive state of the original occupants of our country.

I may be excused for referring to one or two patentees of whom I had personal knowledge during my early practice as illustrations of two classes of inventors, to wit:

Atwood, the inventor of the sun burner and straight chimney, being unable to induce manufacturers to place his improvements on the market, borrowed the money to have his patented articles made and then himself peddled the same from an open wagon around the streets of Chelsea, Mass. In seven or eight years thereafter he had accumulated seven or eight hundred thousand dollars out of his invention.

Another party who obtained a fourteen-year patent, under the old law, then secured an extension for seven years, collected sixty-three thousand dollars during the last—twenty-first year—of his patent.

These cases are mentioned merely as examples of cases where meritorious inventors were not taken up by experts who ought to be able to appreciate the improvements, and of the delay that may follow the issue of a patent before the patent becomes productive.

While I have laid stress herein upon the necessity of the enactment of some law to provide for the extension of patents in order to promote the interests of the people at large as well as to reward meritorious inventors, I am not unmindful of the fact that in proportion to the cost of patents there is no form of investment, taken all in all, that begins to compare in the measure of benefits with that which results from the promotion—development—of patents. It is a poor patent indeed that does not yield, in one form or another, a handsome return. Every patent does not produce a million, or a hundred thousand, or ten thousand, but the rewards come in every conceivable form. Notwithstanding this favorable showing in the behalf of patents, it constitutes no argument, from the standpoint of the statesman, why even better results, if possible, should not be brought about in favor of the unrewarded inventors when their rewards mean greater benefits to the public.

In connection with the writer's professional service in the prosecution of applications for extension while assisting the late Commissioner, Hon. D. P. Holloway, in the management of his large practice as a specialist in patent cases, I learned that only about 2 per cent of the total benefits of inventions went to inventors, while 98 per cent went to the public.

An argument that has been used in opposition to the extension of patents is that the extension would leave the date of expiration of a patent "uncertain," and that such uncertainty would unsettle the legitimate plan of intending manufacturers, leaving them all at sea.

That is to say, that an inventor who has made and patented an invention and diligently striven during the life of his patent to promote it and secure remuneration therefor, but has been unsuccessful; whose efforts may have represented years of labor and toil and the expenditure of all his means, even to the sacrifice of the necessaries of life for those whose prospective comfort and happiness was his chief aim and care, should be deprived of a further opportunity, admitted to be justly due to him in view of the facts in his case, to secure a reward for his invention because some ignoble, mercenary creature, himself incapable of making an invention which would add anything to the sum of human knowledge or happiness, and who has watched the fruitless efforts of the inventor to introduce his invention, and who, selfish being that he is, has been busy making money all the years that the inventor has toiled in making and perfecting his invention and exerting himself to put it on the market, objects to the Government doing that which would give reward to whom it is due and thus promote the progress of the useful arts, in order that he, ignoble wretch, may come in at the hour of victory and appropriate to his own use the reward that is justly due to the inventor. The most charitable view that can be taken of such an argument is that it is evidence of thoughtlessness and of hasty and superficial consideration of great principles.

Are such plans "legitimate?" Are they honest? Are they not inhuman, degrading, offensive to any man who appreciates his reasonable obligations to his fellow-beings? We might as fairly undertake to deprive the returning soldier or sailor, battle scarred or ruined in health, or both, of the credit for his patriotic service for his country and to transfer it to a stay-at-home whose only excuse for not going to the front was his cowardice and his selfishness.

"Legitimate plans," indeed. We might as well give the grain of the farmer to crows, the game of the huntsman to vultures, and the product of honest toil to pirates.

ANOTHER CONSIDERATION PRESENTS ITSELF.

It has been the glory of the country that it has led other nations in its liberal treatment of inventors. This country was the first to enable the inventor to obtain, at a moderate cost, a patent which carried on its face a reasonable presumption of its validity. To this liberal treatment of the inventor the vast progress of the United States has been largely due, according to the opinion of the most competent to pass on such matters. Yet, in one respect, this liberality halts. While other countries provide for extensions, in proper cases, the United States, which owes a greater debt of gratitude to the inventor than any other nation, denies what he is entitled to by every principle of gratitude, good faith, and even of expediency. If this denial of justice resulted from a deliberate action of Congress we might well regard it with feelings of shame and discouragement. An examination of the records of Congress has, however, shown, as noted in a previous portion of this paper, that such denial was not deliberate, and that the change in the law which involved it was probably due to the anxiety of the conference committee to pass the main provisions of the bill under consideration, leaving a restoration of the extension clause of the old act as a matter for later action.

However, wittingly or unwittingly, a great wrong has been done which it becomes every day more incumbent on us to undo.

Very respectfully,

JOSEPH R. EDSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 28, 1903.

EXPLANATORY.

This paper or statement has been prepared for general distribution among inventors and their assigns, manufacturers of patented inventions, legislators, and the legal profession who are interested in inventions and the administration of the patent laws.

Your careful consideration of the same is requested with a view to obtaining your cooperation in efforts to secure the passage of a general bill providing for the extension of patents, substantially in accordance with the practice as built up under the act of 1836, under the provisions of which patents were extended by the Patent Office until March 2, 1875.

If you are in favor of the movement to secure the desired legislation, please give notice thereof to the undersigned; placing the word "Extension" on the outside of the envelope, so that you may be placed in communication with associations or committees that may appear before Congress to urge the passage of the proposed bill. If you desire an answer, or wish to have progress reported to you, you should inclose a stamp for return postage.

The intelligent and patriotic cooperation of those interested in patent property and in the continued material development of the industries of our country, will certainly result in legislation which will undo the injury to the country and the injustice to inventors which have become more and more apparent since the seventeen-year patents began to expire in 1878, and especially since about 1886, five or six years after the first patents issued under the act of 1861 began to expire.

The service which I rendered at the solicitation of an old and meritorious client in the preparation and prosecution of a private bill before Congress to secure the extension of a patent brought facts to my notice which convinced me that the position of Congress on the matter of the extension of patents is almost universally misunderstood.

In fact, during the past two years, during which period I have given this subject more or less consideration from time to time, I have not met one person, layman or lawyer, who could give a true explanation of the position of Congress on this subject or explain why more private bills have not been passed.

In my humble judgment, no amendment to the patent laws could do as much for the honor and glory of our country as the passage of some general law for the extension of patents in proper cases.

Such a law would at once stimulate invention by the encouragement it would give to inventors, and who have failed to secure suitable remuneration for their inventions.

The maintenance of the commercial supremacy of the United States demands that this encouragement be given to inventors.

Inventions have brought the Pacific Ocean as near to New York, measured by time of communication, as Pittsburg or Harrisburg, and all countries of the world, commercially considered, near to the shores of the United States, and the time has now come when nations, as well as individuals and firms, vie with each other in the commendable effort to secure trade supremacy.

As Senator PLATT has well said, "We must look to the inventors of our country to maintain the supremacy which we have achieved."

In view of the nation's absolute dependence upon her inventors to do this, and in order to check the decline in invention which, as shown, appears to have set in about 1887, it behooves us to see to it that inventors are not treated unfairly, thoughtlessly, indifferently, or unjustly, but that they be shown appreciation according to their deserts.

It will be remembered that Professor Robinson says (Robinson on Patents): "Thus, although at the outset our patent laws were in some important aspects more favorable to the inventor than those of England, the development of the theory that the inventor is necessarily a public benefactor, and that the means adopted for his protection and encouragement are in themselves promotive of the public good, has here as well as there produced its legitimate results in the constant increase of his exclusive privilege and the corresponding limitation of the public rights."

In conclusion I again quote from Commissioner Fisher, whose numerous reforms in the Patent Office and whose eminent ability as a patent lawyer make him a conspicuous figure among the many men who have honored the office of Commissioner of Patents:

"What is now needed is the perfection of the system, better and more complete means for carrying it on, and more effectual means for protecting the inventor."

A sense of patriotic duty impelled me to undertake this work. If my feeble efforts at the outset eventuate in the enactment of a law which will add to the honor and glory of my country and promote the comfort and happiness of some of a class of most worthy citizens in recognition of their efforts to promote the general welfare and to help themselves, I shall feel more than repaid for my services.

Respectfully submitted.

JOSEPH R. EDSON,

The Trusts.

OF
HON. EDWARD MORRELL,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 7, 1903,

On the bill (H. R. 17) requiring all corporations engaged in interstate commerce to file returns with the Secretary of the Treasury disclosing their true financial condition and of their capital stock, and imposing a tax upon such as have outstanding capital stock unpaid in whole or in part.

Mr. MORRELL said:

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no serious division of opinion among the public or public men, I believe, as to the desirability of keeping within reasonable bounds and control the great consolidations of capital and enterprise which have come to be called "trusts." But as to the manner and means, and as to the degree and severity of the restraining or controlling treatment, you can hardly find a dozen men anywhere who are of the same mind. There is a great deal of misinformation and misunderstanding about the trusts, Mr. Speaker. There is and has been a great deal of wild talk about killing and exterminating the trusts. A great many prescriptions for curing or killing the trusts have been offered by men who evidently knew little or nothing about the subject. I believe I realize as fully as any member of the House the actual dangers appertaining to the trusts, and I wish as heartily as anyone for the elimination of these dangers; but I am sure that the evils complained of or apprehended would not be avoided by exterminating the trusts, even if such extermination were possible, and I am quite positive that the trusts have been evolved in a perfectly natural manner in the course of the onward movement and development of business operations in this busy and prosperous nation, and that any attempt to violently uproot them and annihilate them, if successful, or even if only partially successful, would entail a commercial catastrophe greater than any ever yet experienced. If it be true, as stated by all the so-called antitrust men, that the trusts actually control and monopolize, approximately, nine-tenths of the industrial enterprises and products of the country, any business man or any man of good sense, it seems to me, must see the absolute necessity of proceeding against them with great caution and in a conservative spirit.

It is possibly true that the great business combinations of recent years have become too powerful and too highly capitalized for public safety, and that the situation demands some remedial action. But such an immensely important matter as this can not be managed by Tom, Dick, and Harry, or safely intrusted to the dictation of persons who know nothing about either business or legal matters. In my opinion it is absurd to think of such a thing as to subject the examination of a great corporation's business books and papers, with a view to recommendation for legislation, to a commission or bureau managed largely by young and inexperienced $2,000 clerks. It is also useless, I think, for the average Congressman to cherish the opinion that he knows enough about the subject to cure the trouble by a bill of his own.

This is a far harder and more delicate matter to settle than the Philippine currency question or the Cuban reciprocity question or any other of the prize problems of the day. It should be intrusted to the legal department of the Government, headed by the leading law officer of the Government, and to the higher courts.

The great variety of specifics that have been recommended in this case show at once how important a case it is and how little positive knowledge there is about it among the people at large and their representatives in Washington. The President himself has expressed at different times quite different opinions as to what he thought was best to be done, and in this uncertainty he has been imitated by scores of our public men. I do not blame him or them for these changes of mind. They only prove that the subject is a big and complicated one, and not to be solved offhand or by a two-days' debate. But the agitation has served to bring on a regular trust fever in Congress here—a kind of panicky feeling not at all justified, in my opinion, and certainly not a state of mind favorable to the formulation and enactment of reasonable, farsighted, fair, just, equitable public measures relating to a matter of so much consequence to every man, woman, and child in the country.

We have already on the statute books a law which would appear quite ample to cover cases of restraint of trade by corporations which deserve to be legally proceeded against and punished. This law, it is said by many, is a failure because it can not be enforced. A great many convictions have been secured under it, but they still say it can not be enforced. Why can it not be enforced? The President and others have supplied the answer to this question, and it would seem the part of wisdom to make it possible to enforce this law, in accordance with suggestions already made, before entering upon a course of additional and very likely unnecessary, if not absolutely harmful, legislation.

On December 2, 1902, I introduced a joint resolution providing that the sum of $250,000 be appropriated to enforce the antitrust laws of the United States, under the direction of the Attorney-General. It then seemed to me that the Sherman antitrust law of 1890 and the interstate-commerce law of 1887 were sufficient to prevent the evils complained of. This resolution was intended to carry out the suggestion of the President in regard to this matter in his last annual message, which was as follows:

> The Congress has not heretofore made any appropriation for the better enforcement of the antitrust law as it now stands. Very much has been done by the Department of Justice in securing the enforcement of the law, but much more could be done if the Congress would make a special appropriation for this purpose, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney-General.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that if Congress had acted promptly on this recommendation of the President and had furnished the Attorney-General with ample means of carrying existing law into effect, more and better results would have followed than by new and more or less crude legislation, especially if without adequate means of enforcement.

Laws will not execute themselves automatically. They provide machinery and lay the track along which that machinery should proceed; but if they do not provide the necessary means for putting that machinery in motion they are utterly useless—worse than useless.

The President no doubt realized this when he urged us to make special appropriations for that purpose. He also realized that the Attorney-General of the United States should control all the financial as well as legal means and all the machinery for carrying the laws into execution. Believing so, he urged us to provide that whatever money might be specially appropriated by us should be expended under the direction of the Attorney-General of the Department of Justice and none other. He did not then recommend the creation of a bureau of corporations in some other department of the Government, over which the Attorney-General would have no direct control. The President's idea seems to have been to enable the Attorney-General to employ lawyers of the highest order of talent and the best professional standing to assist him in a work where the opposing counsel would be sure to be men of similar caliber and among the ablest lawyers in the country. Surely, the Attorney-General of the United States and the ablest jurists whom he could select would be the only proper persons to be pitted, on behalf of the Government, against such men.

I am still in the attitude of urging this resolution because of its spirit and purpose. I realize that the object desired will be obtained through the amendment to the legislative appropriation bill which was put in that bill upon the motion of the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], if that amendment should be adopted by the Senate and pass into law. That amendment is in line with the thought, which I deem worthy of all emphasis, that the control of this whole matter should lie in the Attorney-General, and that the present laws, properly enforced, will be sufficient for the purpose desired.

In this connection I wish to recur again to a point I have already alluded to briefly. Some of the new legislation provides for bringing into publicity the affairs of all corporations engaged in interstate commerce, and to this end the books and papers of such corporations are to be subject to the inspection of public officers whenever the correctness of the reports made by such corporations are not entirely satisfactory to the officers of the Government. Searches and seizures may be made under this provision of law. And hence, considering the means and manner of securing such publicity, we must not forget the limitation placed upon our legislation by the fourth amendment to the Constitution of the United States which provides that "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated."

In the case of Boyd v. United States (116 U. S., 616, 621) the Supreme Court of the United States discussed the application of this provision of the Constitution to section 5 of the act of Congress of June 22, 1874, which authorized a court of the United States, in revenue cases, on motion of the Government attorney, to require the defendant or claimant to produce in court his private books, invoices, and papers, or else the allegations of the attorney should be taken as true.

This provision of the act of Congress the Supreme Court held unconstitutional and void so far as it applied to penalties or went to establish a forfeiture of the party's property or vested rights, for the reason that it was repugnant to the fourth amendment to the Constitution. Justice Bradley's opinion in that case is well worth reading in this connection.

If the evidence sought does not go to the extent of raising the question of some penalty or forfeiture, but relates merely to taxation or reasonable regulation, it would not be held unconstitutional. But is the publicity plan proposed in the pending legislation of that kind? Is it less liable to objection than the provision of the act of 1874 which empowered the courts to require the defendant to produce his private papers in court? Is there no penalty or forfeiture involved in this publicity scheme? And is not the proposition to allow a bureau chief and subordinate clerks the power of intermeddling in the private business affairs of great corporations, and thereby in the affairs of all the people who compose those corporations, likely to result in "unreasonable searches and seizures" of the "papers and effects" of the people? Would it not open the door for intolerable bribery and corruption and persecution? Would it not violate the spirit of the fourth amendment? On the contrary, in the hands of the Attorney-General, investigations of the kind proposed would probably be conducted in all cases reasonably and properly.

Let us take care that we do not overreach ourselves and produce mischiefs a hundredfold greater than any now existing. The President showed exceedingly good judgment, I think, in that part of his message where he deprecated hasty and ill-advised legislation concerning trusts. And I repeat, as applicable to the plea I am now making, his prudent advice. He said:

> In curbing and regulating the combinations of capital which are or may become injurious to the public, we must be careful not to stop the great enterprises which have legitimately reduced the cost of production, not to abandon the place which our country has won in the leadership of the international industrial world, not to strike down wealth with the result of closing factories and mines, of turning the wage-worker idle in the streets and leaving the farmer without a market for what he grows.

I know of nothing better calculated to produce all these evils than "unreasonable searches and seizures of the papers and effects" of great and successful corporations engaged in interstate and international commerce. I do not doubt our constitutional authority to pass a measure requiring needful publicity and the enforcement of it in a reasonable manner by reasonable means where penalties and forfeitures are not aimed at. Indeed, it has been decided by the courts that a statute allowing the supervisor of internal revenue to issue a summons for the production of books and papers is not a violation of the fourth amendment. (1 Abbot Circuit Ct. Reports, p. 317.) And there are numerous decisions of the same kind. But I do deny that in legislating for the control of great corporations, numbering among their officers and stockholders thousands of the people of the different States, Congress has the right to require or enforce publicity by unreasonable means or instrumentalities. I insist that in a matter of such vast importance the Department of Justice is the proper and the only proper custodian of the power to enforce publicity. Therefore I argue and urge that Congress should pass this joint resolution for carrying out the President's recommendation on the subject. If the constitutional question of reasonableness or unreasonableness may arise in every case under a "publicity" law, as I believe it may, the need of prudence and honesty of the highest order in the administration of the law becomes all the more obvious.

None of the proposed new antitrust measures contain any provision for the means of carrying into execution either the old law or the new. They would all be like steam engines without fuel or water; while the President's recommendation, embodied in this resolution, would, if adopted, result in the enforcement of the law as it stands, at least. And accordingly, whatever else we may do or not do, this resolution ought to be passed as a distinctive proposition indicating a definite policy.

As I said in my statement before the Judiciary Committee last December, the size of the suggested appropriation is not so great that it could not be granted with perfect consistency, and I think it is sufficiently large for the present needs of the service. The passage of the resolution would in no way conflict with any new legislation that may be designed or perfected, and without question it would be highly desirable, in any case, to put at the disposal of the Attorney-General the means necessary for conducting whatever investigation or prosecution he may desire to make under existing law.

Since the suggestion was made originally by the President in his last annual message, I hope it may not be thought improper for me to state that I have had communications from the Attorney-General on the subject of this resolution, and that he approves it, both as to its character and as to the amount of money which it carries. At his suggestion I saw the President on the subject, and the President also approved it, referring to the passage in his message which deals directly with this matter. I have no reason to believe that either the President or the Attorney-General has changed his mind since December in respect to the advisability of the legislation and appropriation which I propose.

This, it seems to me, would constitute the safest and most sensible method that we could employ for dealing with the trust problem. I repeat that it is a problem of great difficulty, delicacy, and complication. It involves practically a rearrangement and readjustment of the entire business system of the country. The salvation or the ruin of the nation may depend upon the prudence and wisdom, or the imprudence and folly, of our present deliberations and decisions. Surely it is a time for the utmost calmness, coolness, and conservatism. We ought to act in the present crisis like the officers of a steamship threatened with shipwreck, and not like a crew of ignorant Lascars or like a lot of panic-stricken passengers.

Let us not run away with the idea that the trusts are a Goliath and that we are called upon to fill the rôle of David. The trusts are not a cancer in the body politic; they are not an excrescence on the body politic; they are a part of the vital principle of the body politic. They need to be properly regulated and watched and controlled, just the same as any vital organ of the body needs to be, but in like manner they need to be guarded from violent injury. They are just as truly a natural and logical development of the industrial and commercial activity of the age as is the printing press, or the locomotive, or the sewing machine, or the typewriting machine, or any other labor-saving machine, or as the telegraph, or the telephone. Stated briefly, their main object and office is to enable business to be carried on more effectively and economically, and to facilitate the absolutely necessary extension of our markets abroad for the disposal of our surplus production, and for the continued employment of our army of workingmen. That many and great evils have arisen in the course of the evolution of this new and important business system, nobody denies. But the evils should be attacked in a manner which will insure the preservation of the benefits flowing from the trusts. In cutting down the weeds we must be careful not to cut down the useful, fruitful plants.

Agricultural Appropriation Bill.

OF
HON. JOHN J. FEELY,
OF ILLINOIS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, January 24, 1903.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 16910) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904—

Mr. FEELY said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: During the last week, when we had under debate the proposition to create a department of labor and commerce, members favoring the bill constantly called attention to the fact that the great success of the Department of Agriculture was a standing argument why this House should adopt the proposition for the creation of that new department. I believe that the Department of Agriculture has been a great success. While the field for successful labor is exceedingly broad, and while the results achieved have been of the greatest benefit to the people of the United States, I am inclined to believe that the magnificent and striking results which have followed the successful launching of this Department have been in a great measure due to the character and remarkable ability of the gentlemen who have successively administered the executive duties of that Department.

Within a short period after its institution that distinguished citizen of Wisconsin, the Hon. Jeremiah M. Rusk, a former member of this House, took charge of it and developed it with signal success. The late J. Sterling Morton, of Nebraska, gave to its administration four years of his brilliant and forceful life. And now, administered as it is by that broad statesman and aggressive citizen of Iowa, it has been placed upon a solid basis of usefulness.

The present Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wilson, allows no politics to interfere with the administration of his office. He is courteous alike to everyone and always watchful in behalf of his Department.

I have read with pleasure his report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, in which he discusses ably and well the many matters in the various offices and bureaus intrusted to his supervision. The vast advances made in developing the work of the Weather Bureau, providing for the warning of approaching storms and hurricanes, of killing frosts, etc., ought to appeal to every tiller of the soil that owes allegiance to our great Government.

Wireless telegraphy, beyond the dreams even of the scientists of the early part of the nineteenth century, occupied much attention from the chief of the Bureau during the past year.

Under the head of the Bureau of Animal Industry, organized by act of Congress, 1890, and supplemented by act of March 3, 1891, by an act providing "for the inspection of live cattle, hogs, the carcasses and products thereof, which are the subjects of the interstate commerce, and for other purposes." The remarkably healthy condition of the packing industries of the country is the strongest indication of the great wealth and remarkably stable condition of the agricultural industry.

The Secretary reports 59,158,648 ante-mortem inspections of animals intended for slaughter, which shows an increase over the number for the year previous of 2,789,338. The cost of these inspections was 1.08 cents each. The number of post-mortem inspections was 38,903,625. The carcasses condemned numbered 61,980, besides 17,445 parts of carcasses. This very last statement shows the great industry of the Department, and the prevention of the consumption by the American people of many thousands of pounds of meat absolutely unfit for food. The processes of meat inspection, tagging, branding, and stamping is proceeding with machine-like regularity, demonstrating the discipline and efficiency prevailing in the Department.

The significant feature of this report is the statement that "the number of clearances of vessels carrying live stock for the fiscal year ending 1902 was 837, which is considerably less than the previous year—a condition due to the decreased exports of cattle and horses." Under this Bureau was also carried on the inspection of 65,213 cattle, 3,776 sheep and lambs; also a few asses, mules, and hogs admitted from the Republic of Mexico. This, also, is the Bureau which maintains a strict quarantine at the ports of the seacoast in order to prevent the introduction of animal plagues.

The live-stock growers have a right to and do demand a most rigid inspection at these ports in order to prevent the admission of diseases which may cause them many millions of dollars direct loss. To prevent this, and with an economical eye to the heavy expense which the Government would be under to eradicate these diseases, as shown by the remarkably large appropriation made by this Congress to eradicate the foot and mouth disease now prevalent in New England, the Secretary of Agriculture is exacting a most rigid inspection and examination at these ports.

It may be interesting to the farmer, busy man as he is, engaged in his daily pursuits, to learn that in spite of our vast institutions of cattle, sheep, and hog raising, we have imported from the Dominion of Canada cattle, sheep, and horses to the number of 27,716, 148,313, and 3,305, respectively, and also 5,356 hogs, which were not subject to quarantine. There were also imported and quarantined 1,214 cattle, 231 sheep, and 33 hogs.

In the endeavor to do the utmost to prevent the importation of cattle affected with tuberculosis the Department has established a veterinarian in Great Britain, whose duty it is to test with tuberculin all cattle over over six months old destined for ports of the United States. The report shows that 139, out of a total of 1,067, were rejected in the past year. These cattle for the most part are brought over for breeding purposes, and the value of such an inspection must be very clear.

The work of stamping out Texas fever, blackleg, sheep-scab, tuberculosis, hog cholera, and foot-and-mouth diseases is progressing with renewed vigor as a result of the liberal appropriation made by Congress for this purpose.

A closer scrutiny and a more thorough acquaintance with this Bureau will demonstrate its value to every live-stock breeder, no matter how small his capital, and will amply repay him by a demonstration of the economy and thrift which should be part of his daily system of management.

Thousands of acres in the vicinity of some of our large cities are left to waste, while they are amply able to yield thousands of dollars of revenue were they properly and scientifically stocked with animals. In the remarks I am now making I have not the time to go into details concerning farm management and the development of the various plants. I can only say that the unrestrained communication with the Department on the part of the farmers of our country is most valuable and that they, the farmers, should not be backward about addressing this executive branch of our Government, as it will be of great avail in the pursuit of their occupation.

A very creditable feature of the work of last year was that concerning the farmers' institutes, and the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture that $6,000 be appropriated by Congress to enable the office to establish experimental stations to aid the farmers' institutes during the fiscal year 1904 is one which in my judgment should meet with approval. The farmers' institute is a great rural convention. Here ideas are interchanged, and a friendly rivalry often brings out the ability frequently latent in rural communities; here is discussed intelligently the business in which the people of the community are most interested. Farmers' institutes are now held in 44 States and Territories, and 2,300 institutes are annually held. These have been encouraged by this appropriation. The Secretary can develop the farmers' institute until it shall be a productive assemblage in every community.

Mr. Chairman, I desire also to call your attention to the provisions of the last section of the bill, which provides the appropriation of $30,000 "to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make inquiries in regard to road management throughout the United States, to make investigations in regard to road making, and the best kind of road-making materials in the several States. I can not, Mr. Chairman, too strongly express my unqualified approval of this appropriation. I would not for one moment sanction any of the sweeping measures such as have been introduced by some members here for the wholesale appropriation of money to develop roads of this country. But so long as we confine ourselves to experiment work, to the gathering together of information that will enable the experiment to cooperate with the various communities in the development of a system of good roads, the Department should be encouraged by as liberal appropriation as is reasonable and fair.

The history of the good-roads movement is epitomized by the Secretary in his Report, on page 117, in which he deals with the question of "cooperation in object-lesson road work." He says:

The building of object-lesson and experimental roads has, during the past year, assumed a position of higher importance than ever before in the work of this office. Most of this work during the past year has been done in cooperation with several forces, each having a special interest in the improvement of public highways. The first of these cooperating forces, the National Good Roads Association, was organized by public-spirited citizens to promote, by agitation and organization, the improvement of public roads. Its work is educational in character, and one of its aims is to organize State and district associations. The second of these forces, the manufacturers of road-building machinery, contributes to the cooperative work the use of machines for building sample roads as well as experts to operate and explain this machinery. The third, one or another of the great railroad corporations, contributes the use of a train, popularly known as a "good-roads train," to carry from place to place, along its lines, the machinery and representatives of all the cooperative forces.

In this work the railroad corporations are actuated by a desire to develop the country tributary to their lines; particularly to secure the improvement of the roads over which commodities must be hauled to and from their stations. The Office of Public Road Inquiries of the Department constitutes the fourth cooperator. Its work is advisory, supervisory, and educational. The people of the various communities in which conventions are held and sample roads built may be mentioned as a fifth cooperating force, and a very important one, since it is not only the principal recipient of the benefits, but must furnish the money, the materials, the common labor, and the horse-power needed in building the object-lesson roads.

The character of this cooperative work can best be indicated by briefly describing the work done in the South during the past autumn, winter, and spring. In October, 1901, the Southern Railroad Company fitted up a good-roads train, consisting of a locomotive and 12 cars, which carried the representatives of all the cooperating forces and road-building machinery furnished by five of the principal concerns that manufacture such machinery in the United States. The itinerary of this train extended through six States—Virginia, North and South Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, and Georgia—and covered a distance of 4,037 miles, the whole campaign occupying over five months. Stops of a week or more were made at 18 different places, at each of which a road convention was held and object-lesson and experimental road work done.

This practical work included the improvement of earth roads, the building of gravel, chert, shell, sand and clay, and macadam roads, the object being to utilize local materials wherever possible and to illustrate the best methods of using them. Many thousands of people attended the sessions of these conventions and took lessons in practical road work. Addresses were delivered by many men of prominence in political, educational, and religious fields, as well as by scientific and practical road builders and representative farmers. Permanent good roads associations were organized in every State visited. It is believed that the work done has aroused a deep and permanent interest in road improvement in the States visited, and has started a movement for better roads that will ultimately yield results of inestimable value to the South. Plans for work of a similar character in several Northwestern States have been matured and will be carried out during the current year.

Aside from the cooperative work just described, the office has done much sample road work in cooperation with the State and county officials, educational institutions, and experiment stations. In this way sample roads have been built in four States: Maryland, West Virginia, Ohio, and North Carolina.

The demand of object-lesson road work of the character indicated is very great and comes from all sections. The office has been able to comply with only a small part of the requests for its active participation in the building of sample roads. During the coming year work of this kind will be extended as greatly as the force and means of the office will justify. It should be remembered that this object-lesson work costs the Department nothing except the salaries and expenses of its employees. In view of this fact, and of its great practical value, the propriety of extending work of this kind seems apparent.

The road-material laboratory is operated in collaboration with the Bureau of Chemistry, and its operations have already been discussed in connection with the work of that bureau. The increasing demand for services of this laboratory shows that its work is appreciated by practical road builders.

Mr. Chairman, I know the readiness with which many scoff at the question of public road improvement; I appreciate the strength of the arguments, used by those who see little merit in the movement, that the steam railroad—that the trolley car, penetrating, as it now does, vast rural territories, meet with every necessity. But I believe that the farmers of this country, indulging their natural pride, appreciating the economy of progress and the value of rapid and comfortable locomotion, appreciating the economy of time and of force which is involved in the question of good roads, will yet awake to this movement, and that in the course of time they will take hold of this question in a patriotic fashion, characteristic of them, and carry this grand cause to a successful fruition.

Is it too much to dream of the farmer of the future moving his products over macadam roads universally, riding in comfortable and modern vehicles, living in the most modern residences, enjoying alike the beauty, the picturesque, the hygienic, and salubrious climatic features of country life, and the modern elements of comfort afforded by city life?

The Appian way and the military roads of the Roman Empire must, if progress of the future can be divined from the history of the progress of the past, give way in splendor and usefulness to the beautiful roadways that science and public spirit will dedicate to the public of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, the Twelfth Census of the United States, referred to in the report of the Secretary of Agriculture, is astonishing in its demonstration of the magnitude of the agricultural industry. Twenty billions of dollars, four times the fixed capital invested in the manufactures, expresses the fixed capital invested in the agricultural industry—land, buildings, implements, machinery, and live stock. During the year 1900 there were approximately 5,740,000 farms in the United States, covering an area of 841,000,000 acres, 415,000,000 of which consisted of improved land. The land values alone represent an investment of $16,675,000,000. By this same census report it is shown that 40,000,000—more than half of our total population—reside on farms. Five billion dollars represents the products of American agriculture for the year 1899. The crop of indian corn which formed the leading item had a value of $828,000,000; hay and forage, $484,000,000; wheat, $370,000,000; oats, $217,000,000; cotton, $324,000,000; live stock, $900,000,000; milk, butter, and cheese, $472,000,000; poultry and eggs, $281,000,000.

Let holocaust, pestilence, or famine destroy the great cities of America, the ingenuity, the wealth, the ability, and the productiveness of the agricultural sections will rebuild them in a Phoenix-like fashion, but the destruction and ruin of the agricultural industry would bring destruction and ruin alike to our great Government. This is America's greatest industry.

Princes and lords may flourish or may fade,
A breath can make them as a breath has made;
But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
When once destroyed can never be supplied.

[Loud applause.]

The Life and Character of the Late Hon. W. J. Sewell.

REMARKS
HON. ROBERT ADAMS, JR.,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 8, 1903,

On the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That this House has heard with sincere regret the announcement of the death of the Hon. WILLIAM JOYCE SEWELL, late a Senator of the United States from the State of New Jersey, and tenders to the family of the deceased the assurance of its profound sympathy with them in the bereavement they have been called upon to sustain, and the further assurance that this House recognizes the lofty patriotism and eminent abilities of the deceased and the value of his long and distinguished public service to his country.

"Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to transmit to the family of Mr. SEWELL a certified copy of the foregoing resolution."

Mr. ADAMS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I can not say that these memorial services which we hold in commemoration of our departed colleagues appeal to my best judgment. I rarely participate in them, but there are occasions when the distinguished abilities of the departed member make an irresistible call for recognition, and when to this is added a warm friendship of many years' standing one can not refrain from paying the tribute justly due to the legislator and the friend. In my opinion the best eulogy that any man can have is the record of his public services during his life. That opinion is more than confirmed by the case of the distinguished gentleman whose memory I rise to honor. His life was one of acts and deeds and not of speech. His acts are recorded in the records of his Congressional career. His energy is displayed in the many business interests which he brought to a state of almost perfection, and his gallant deeds are written on the pages of the history of the country he loved so well.

The life of General SEWELL is one of the grandest illustrations of the liberality of our institutions, as founded by our forefathers, to enable individual worth and individual energy to have full opportunity for their development under our free institutions, regardless of station in life or the support of powerful influence.

Senator SEWELL, inspired by that active ambition which predominates in the Scotch-Irish character, emigrated to this country at the age of 18 years. He at once entered upon his life work with a clear and vigorous mind and with a stern determination to meet every duty and trust with his best effort. He was engaged in mercantile pursuits until 1861, when the war of secession broke out. With the same assurance that appertained to his daily work he applied in his conviction that his services belonged to his adopted country. He was receiving its benefits. He felt that he must return his obligation in maintaining its integrity. He organized a company of volunteers and was commissioned a captain in the Fifth New Jersey Regiment, and served during the entire war with gallantry and military ability. His devotion to his new duty was such that within a year he was promoted to be lieutenant-colonel, and was severely wounded at the battles of Chancellorsville and Gettysburg. It was at the former battle that while temporarily commanding the Second Brigade of New Jersey he led a daring charge and achieved one of the most brilliant successes of the war, capturing many stands of colors, and so earned his brigadier-generalcy.

At the close of the war, on April 2, 1865, we find him still in the service, taking an active part in the campaign which led to the surrender of General Lee. After his long and gallant service at the close of the war he was brevetted major-general.

General SEWELL'S military career is another illustration of the patient care and strict attention to the matter in charge which always characterized whatever he undertook. A strict disciplinarian, he was noted for his kindly feeling for and the careful attention which he gave to the men under his command. He was esteemed and beloved by all who came into contact with him, and even amid the rigor and hardships of a military campaign the kindly side of his nature was never hardened by the terrible scenes and acts occurring daily under his knowledge.

Senator SEWELL illustrated that type of American soldier who, like Cincinnatus, when the war was over, laid down his sword and returned to his peaceful avocations. He entered into the service of the Pennsylvania Railroad system in its New Jersey branches. Here again his indomitable will and perseverence led to his rapid promotion, and he passed from one grade to another until he became president of one of its roads. Senator SEWELL'S mind was of too active a nature to be limited simply to his business routine. He was naturally attracted to public affairs, and took an active interest in the politics of the State of New Jersey. This State was wise enough to command his services, and he was elected to the State senate. Here the same force of character stood him in good stead, and with the same result, for he became the president of the senate. In 1881 he was chosen by the legislature to be its United States Senator. In that body he was known as the "silent Senator," but the impression must not be gained that he could not express his views, for when his counsel was sought Senator SEWELL could express his judgment in as clear and forceful a manner as any of his colleagues in that illustrious body. It was not lack of ability, it was the modesty and reserve of the man, as he rarely volunteered his advice, but never sought to evade the responsibility of his position when his opinion was demanded.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is left to those who knew Senator SEWELL as a friend and in his domestic relations to most thoroughly appreciate his character. Like all men of reserve, when once a man was taken into his friendship, he was loyal to an uncommon degree and stood ever ready to aid and advise when called upon by that tie. It was my good fortune to see a good deal of Senator SEWELL in a social way, and I will ever prize the opportunity I so had of knowing a man of so pure and honest a character, with such high ideas of his duties in public and private life, and much as the State will mourn his loss and miss his great services, and brilliant as is his record on the pages of his country's history, it will be those who knew him best will mourn him the most.

The Department of Commerce and Labor.

OF
HON. CHARLES F. COCHRAN,
OF MISSOURI,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, January 15, 1903.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (S. 569) to create a new executive department of the Government to be known as the Department of Commerce and Labor—

Mr. COCHRAN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I address myself first to the main question, Shall this new Department be established? Certainly numerous and plausible arguments in favor of it have been made and if the pending bill only provided for the creation of a Department of Commerce, with misgivings as to the wisdom of further enlargement of the vast system of bureauocracy into which the Government is being transformed, I would yield to the suggestion that the proposed new Department might vastly promote industrial and commercial development and give it my support.

But, Mr. Chairman, the bill proposes to create a Department of Commerce and Labor, thereby vesting the head of the Department with powers and imposing upon him duties which, if not repugnant, are at least not entirely harmonious.

To commit the interests of labor to the keeping of the Secretary of Commerce, to treat the labor problem upon a plane with the transactions of the bourse or the market place, is a mistake so grave that it is grotesque.

Mr. Chairman, what do we expect to accomplish by creating a Department of Commerce? The name of the new Department answers the question. We hope to develop new fields of profitable trade and foster old ones. We hope to facilitate industrial development and promote commerce at home and abroad. What should be the qualifications of the chief of this new Department? Above everything else, he should be a man of affairs, acquainted with the vast subject with which he must deal; vigilant, enterprising, resourceful, and possessed of the sagacity which distinguishes the American man of business from all others.

We will look to this Department to give direction to the energetic campaign that has for its object the conquest of the markets of the world by American merchants and manufacturers.

How to produce the best and at the same time the cheapest commodities and send them where they are wanted is the most vital problem of international commerce. Upon its solution everything else depends.

Plainly, then, Mr. Chairman, the work in hand calls for the practical experience and training of the merchant, the manufacturer, the financier, and if the new department is to justify the hopes of its founders, at its head must be placed a man uniting statesmanship with much experience in business.

But, Mr. Chairman, I protest against committing to a man such as I have described the safe-keeping of the interests of labor. The labor problem—the problem of the ages—the most vital of problems—is in its very essence a social problem. I would not expect at the hands of the man of per centums and bargains even an honest effort to understand this problem, much less a policy in dealing with it consonant with the welfare of the millions who depend upon the earnings of labor for a livelihood.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] says he declines to admit that there is an irreconcilable war between labor and capital. That is not the way to put it. Unquestionably the selfish interests of capital and labor clash, but it is not a war. There is no war between a man who buys a farm and the one who sells it, but the purchaser is eager to buy it at a less price, while he who sells seeks a larger consideration. There is no war between a manufacturer who offers goods for sale and the merchant who buys them, but their interests conflict. Each seeks to promote his own welfare—to increase his own profits. On this line rages the endless contention between labor and capital, and experience has shown that with labor unorganized, with each individual in the vast industrial army segregated from his fellows and fighting the stern battle for bread alone, slavery must inevitably be the fate of the vast majority.

A profound consciousness of this fact has led to the organization of the breadwinners of the United States, and unbending opposition to labor organizations on the part of the great corporations engaged in production warns us that in the future the gravest problem with which statesmanship must deal is how to measurably reconcile the contention that rages between these stupendous forces.

History admonishes us that force can not be relied upon to wisely solve this problem. We should not forget that centuries ago precisely analogous conditions led to conflicts precisely similar to the struggle now going on in this country. On the one side rich employers, arrogant and conscious of the power of wealth and the weakness of poverty; on the other the wage-earners organized into fraternal brotherhoods.

Then, as now, the employer contended that for the laborers to organize and assert the right to deal en masse with employers was an interference with his legal right to dictate to each laborer separate from his fellows the terms and conditions of employment. Then, as now, the rejoinder of labor to this autocratic assumption was defiance, and persistence in the effort to escape by organized resistance the progress of an industrial order which, in the end, if unopposed, would inevitably lead to slavery.

Mr. Chairman, let us see if we can arrive at a precise definition of the issue between labor and capital. It arises thus: A employs a thousand men. If he may deal with them individually, he can say to each, "Take what I offer or quit my employment." With what result? Concede this power and he may dictate absolutely all the stipulations of the labor contract. He may dictate the hours of labor, the price of labor, the kind of quarters the men shall occupy, and thus exercise a tyranny as despotic and all-pervading as ever was exercised by the owner of a chattel slave.

I have never heard from the lips of an enemy of organized labor any satisfactory rejoinder to this arraignment of the industrial system which would result from the denial of the right of the effective organization of laborers.

Of course we hear it said that labor is a commodity, and as such should be sold by each individual laborer in competition with others. This is puerile. Labor differs from all other commodities in many and vital ways. By disposing of his labor, the laborer for the time being disposes of his person. He loses power to control his associations and environment. Furthermore, he must sell his commodity—his labor—to-day, to-morrow, and every day. The merchant, failing to obtain a satisfactory price for his wares, may lay them back on the shelf and await a better offer. Instead of a loss, he may gain by the delay, for the price of his wares may advance. Failing to find a buyer to-day, he may wait until to-morrow.

Failing to dispose of his wares in one place he may carry them to some other market and dispose of them, or may often consume them himself. The laborer can do none of these things. He must sell his labor now—to-day—or it is forever lost. His necessities—the daily wants of himself and his household—compel him to sell his commodity day after day, in good times and in bad, for what it will bring.

It is frequently urged that instead of organizing, laborers should seek other remedies. "If the terms offered by the employer do not suit him he should quit and seek other employment," is about the way it is usually stated. This is generally impossible, and at the best would not help matters. How would he gain a living while pursuing this remedy? Would he better his condition by the change? With no organization to stand between him and his employer, what would he gain by changing taskmasters?

One further observation on this branch of the subject. Recently there has occurred a decrease in the number of independent operators—an increase in the percentage of our population dependent upon employment and wages for a living. There has been also an increase in the percentage of people living in cities. This only intensifies the struggle and increases the gravity of an economic and social problem as old as civilization and trade. It was with our progenitors centuries ago; it will be with our descendants centuries hence. Statesmen and governments have tried in various ways to satisfactorily solve it, and yet I believe its solution is possible.

At every stage of the controversy labor has petitioned for an appeal to reason and the abandonment of force as a means of settling labor disputes. For seven centuries this demand has been spurned by the rulers, lawmakers, and statesmen of christendom. It is met by the doctrinaire of the old school with the declaration that to attempt to establish courts for the settlement of labor disputes is impracticable and visionary. The purse-proud manufacturer and mine owner declare that such a scheme would invade personal rights. The dollar-mark statesman who thrives by dabbling in watered-stock schemes of development says that already the exactions of labor unions have increased the cost of production to a dangerous degree.

These arguments have prevailed and, regardless of the danger that lurks in gathering clouds, we repeat the folly of the ages, and in this free country have made little progress in the direction of rational treatment of the labor problem.

We should not forget that every day the environment of the laborer and the conditions of employment are undergoing changes which add to the gravity of questions to be dealt with. Formerly thousands, probably a majority, of the unskilled laborers, were employed by the year. They may have received a small per diem, but they were secure against idleness for a year. Now the term of employment is precarious.

In most employments, the mechanic as well as the common laborer is now employed by the day or by the hour. The significance of this revolution in industrial life can not be exaggerated. Think of it! Formerly the breadwinner was employed by the year; then by the month; then by the week; then by the day, and now by the hour. In all great manufacturing enterprises the tendency is the same.

To comprehend the importance of these changes in the industrial order, we must take into the account the fact that in dealing with the wage-earners of this generation we are not dealing with the illiterate serfs of former times. A century ago few laborers could read and write. The mechanics and artisans of a hundred years ago were uneducated, and inferior to the wage-earners of to-day in intelligence.

Mr. Chairman, even when the laborer was illiterate harsh legislation, repression, did not prevent him from resisting the oppression inseparable from an industrial system in which the employer claims autocratic power over all the stipulations of the labor contract. Behold a schoolhouse on every hill and in every valley, placing within reach of every boy and girl in this Republic, rich and poor alike, the same avenues to improvement and education, and be warned against persevering in the errors of the past. You can not build schoolhouses and employ teachers to fit men and women for a social paradise, and expect them to dwell in contentment in an industrial hell.

Mr. Chairman, I have digressed from the subject in hand apparently, but it was for the purpose of drawing attention to the fact that the labor problem is a political, a social problem. It must be studied apart from the relation of labor to the profits of the bargain counter. I can not believe that a man capable of meeting our expectations as a Secretary of Commerce would approach the labor problem with any just conception of its true nature or of its vast importance except as it is related to the question of the cost of the production of things. This is one phase of the question, to be sure, and an important one, but it is not paramount.

Your Secretary of Commerce will be drawn from classes and your Department of Commerce will be dominated by influences interested solely in increasing trade and the profits of traders. It is idle to say that the President would appoint a Secretary of the Department of Commerce who would sympathize with the laborer's battle for a better living and sympathize with the employer's quest for cheaper production and larger profits, and who would seek to hold the scales of justice evenly between them.

I think it is demonstrable that unwise and discriminative policies long pursued by the railroads have blighted the villages, prevented the growth of small cities, and thus driven the laborers into the great cities, to their immeasurable injury. Therefore I believe that a just solution of the transportation problem would contribute to the welfare of all wage-earners. Accord to the village, hamlet, and small city transportation facilities and rates such as are enjoyed by the large cities and they will grow and prosper, and the tendency to the congestion of wage-earners in cities will be arrested. If this be true, by moving in this direction we could do more to settle the labor problem than in any other way; yet we are going on in the contrary direction.

The drift of the laboring classes to the great cities is the most ominous sign of the times.

What is the consequence? They occupy crowded tenement houses, dwelling in continual wretchedness, and rearing their families where the roofs, the fire escapes, or the street, must be resorted to for even a breath of fresh air.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that much of the suffering and many of the misfortunes I have mentioned are unescapable, but I know also that many of these evil outgrowths are the result of evil practices, which could be and ought to be prevented. The victims are helpless. Wise statesmanship, uncurbed by the maxim that "Business is business," must find a remedy for such of these evils as are curable, or still greater evils will be visited upon all classes. Hopelessness is the forerunner of despair. Misery is the mother of crime.

Say to the multiplying thousands who swarm in the slums of the great cities that there is no hope of better things, that they and their posterity forever must dwell amid such evil environments, and they will interpret the message as a declaration that as to many (perhaps when the evolution of the industrial order shall be complete, a majority) of God's creatures civilization is a failure, Christianity a farce, and the pretense of just government a travesty. Would such an interpretation of such a declaration be right, or wrong?

Mr. Chairman, I contend that here I have suggested another phaze of the labor problem which must be dealt with. I do not believe it would be regarded as a problem in sociology by the Secretary of Commerce. I do not believe he would consider it at all. Apprised of all its evil consequences, he would probably shrug his shoulders and say, "Business is business," and in five minutes forget that he had ever heard of it. And yet it is the opinion of all sociologists and students of social economics that the tendency to the congestion of wage-earners in cities is the most menacing augury of the times.

It is true that this tendency is world-wide, but it is more marked in the United States than anywhere else, and this, too, notwithstanding the fact that here it should, and under normal conditions would, be least active.

In France, where a population of nearly 40,000,000 occupy an area of territory so small that were you to place it in Texas and make Texas a sea you would have a hundred miles of water all around you, a larger number of people out of every thousand live on the land, outside the cities, than in the United States—a republic continental in area, extending from ocean to ocean, and from British Columbia to the Gulf. Why this difference? It is because the little neighborhood factory is prosperous in France, and the little factory in the French hamlet prospers because in France the large city and the small hamlet fare alike in railroad rates and facilities.

Mr. Chairman, other considerations bearing upon our politics, and closely related to the labor problem, are too important to be overlooked. The lawmaker who has not discerned in recent years political tendencies which, if unchecked, will lead eventually to a complete revolution of the parliamentary situation which has prevailed in the United States for a hundred years has not closely studied events. So far the control of the Government has rested in the hands of one or the other of two great political parties. First the Federalists and Republicans contended for mastery. Later the Democrats and Whigs, and for the last fifty years the Democrats and Republicans have divided the voters into two vast armies, and throughout a century one or the other of these great political organizations has governed this country. Mr. Chairman, the change in the environment of a large proportion of the voters of the country has set on foot a new social movement which, originating in a community of interests, is destined to lead to concerted political action.

We began as a nation essentially rural. During the early years of the Republic the owners of the soil controlled political parties and the Government. The cities now exercise supreme control of the machinery of parties. Thus far the voters of the cities have remained loyal to the great party organizations to which I have referred. How much longer will they continue to be loyal to these parties? How long will our political battles be fought out by two great party organizations and end, necessarily, in placing one or the other of these great parties in control? Sir, I predict that in the not distant future numerous seats on this floor, and later a few seats at the other end of the Capitol, now held by Democrats and Republicans, will be occupied by the representatives of a new party evolved from the interminable struggle over the labor problem, and that the balance of power in politics and government will eventually be held by these newcomers.

Mr. Chairman, the drift of politics in this country during the past six years has given tremendous impetus to this tendency. What ground for hope of fair consideration of the rights of those who toil can be found in the history of American politics during that period? My distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has just entertained us with a rehearsal of the election statistics showing the great victories of the Republican party in 1896, 1898, and 1900. Unfortunately for the country, his extravagant claims are justified by the facts. But, Mr. Chairman, let us consider briefly the consequences of these glorious Republican victories.

It is true that several States heretofore Democratic were swept into the Republican column in 1896 and have remained there ever since, and the Republican membership of Congress has been strengthened proportionately. The Republicans gained two seats in the Senate by retiring two Democrats from New York and sending two Republicans in their places. To whom were the Senatorships awarded? Were they given to representatives of the laboring men and producers? No. One went to Mr. Vanderbilt's attorney, Mr. DEPEW, and the other to the United States Express Company in the person of its president, Mr. PLATT.

Two Democratic Senators from West Virginia gave way to two Republicans. Who are they? Representatives of labor or agriculture? No. Messrs. ELKINS and SCOTT, partners in the ownership of the West Virginia coal monopoly. A veteran from Ohio, who first and last had more strongly impressed his personality upon Republican politics and policies than any man of a generation in which giants were his colleagues in the Senate, Mr. Sherman, was flattered into surrendering a seat in that august body to the worst member of the gang of newcomers who now control the Republican party machine.

Who is the beneficiary of the conspiracy by which John Sherman, in his dotage, was wheedled into placing himself under the espionage of Mr. Day, from Dayton, and finally retired, broken-hearted, from a Cabinet office in which he had been placed not for the purpose of honoring him with its dignity or with the intention of permitting him to exercise its duties, but solely for the purpose of making a place in the Senate for the chief of the fat fryers. Is he a representative of the millions who toil in shop, mine, field, and factory? No! He is the prince of political boodlers and a type of the stock-jobber statesmen who swarm at party headquarters during campaigns and are gradually taking possession of all branches of the Federal Government.

Do you think the laboring man who, in his home or boarding house, reads the newspapers and knows these facts as well as you do is unaware of their meaning? Gentlemen, these things are driving from his heart the hope of better things at your hands, and he will not much longer follow a party leadership drawn from the directory of corporations and identified with circles essentially hostile to the dearest interests of the millions who toil for a livelihood. [Applause.]

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I declare that solely because this bill proposes to place the Labor Bureau in charge of the Secretary of Commerce I am opposed to it and shall vote against its passage. [Applause.]

HON. CHAMP CLARK,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 22, 1903,

On the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted, the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of the Hon. JAMES MONTRAVILLE MOODY, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of North Carolina.

"Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a faithful and distinguished public servant, the House at the conclusion of the memorial proceedings shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk be, and he is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased."

Mr. CLARK said:

Mr. SPEAKER: When the Fifty-seventh Congress convened, if one had been called upon to select, on view, the two members destined for greatest length of days, he would most likely have selected R. C. De Graffenreid, of Texas, and JAMES MONTRAVILLE MOODY, of North Carolina. In a month's journey, a traveler would have found no more splendid specimens of American manhood. Robust, in the morning of life, handsome, ambitious, courageous, and patriotic, they have been cut off untimely, suddenly, unexpectedly, to the amazement of their fellows and the sorrow of their friends.

Mr. MOODY served his country both in the field and in Congress. The record shows that he was a faithful soldier and a faithful Representative. He possessed in a large degree the popular manner, and consequently was a prime favorite both at home and in Washington.

It so happened, Mr. Speaker, that I was one of the Congressional committee appointed to attend his funeral at his home in Waynesville, amid the mountains of the old North State—among the people who knew him best. The scenes witnessed there constitute a triumphant refutation of the cynical proverb, "Familiarity breeds contempt." We were among the familiars of JAMES MONTRAVILLE MOODY—his kindred, his neighbors, his political supporters, his political opponents. There was no trace of contempt. There were indubitable signs of affection and grief on every hand.

The rich, the poor, the old, the young, white and black, male and female were there by the thousand, and the only feeling among those mountaineers was pride in the dead Congressman, sorrow for their departed friend. All the preachers of the town participated in the funeral proceedings, and he was followed to the grave by the uniformed societies of the county and by a vast concourse of weeping constituents.

It may be doubted if in this wide, wide world there is a more beautiful or picturesque spot than the place where Mr. MOODY sleeps his final sleep. The mountains which he loved so well stand mute sentinels about his grave. There we laid him to rest to await the final summons which will call the quick and the dead to the judgment bar of God.

Eulogy on the Late Hon. J. M. Moody, of North Carolina.

HON. JOSEPH T. JOHNSON,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 22, 1903,

On the following resolutions—

"Resolved, That in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted, the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of the Hon. JAMES MONTRAVILLE MOODY, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of North Carolina.

"Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a faithful and distingnished public servant, the House at the conclusion of the memorial proceedings shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk be, and he is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased."

Mr. JOHNSON said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It is fitting that we should pause amid the pressing duties of the closing hours of the session to pay tribute to the memory of one of our fellow-members who has been taken from the scene of his labors by the remorseless hand of Death.

It is well known that the people of mountainous sections of country are remarkable for their intensity of feeling, their love of independence and liberty, their generosity and hospitality, and their want of hypocrisy. The story of William Tell and the deeds of Robert Bruce are immortal tributes to the character of all mountain peoples. They are the most loyal people in the world. If they are your friends you need never doubt their fidelity, and if they are your enemies they never attempt to deceive you.

Such are the people of western North Carolina, and JAMES M. MOODY truly represented them, not only upon the floor of this House, where he was always their able and faithful champion, but he represented them as a man. Those who opposed him knew that he was actuated always by the highest and purest motives, and those who labored with him knew that he never tried to deceive an opponent. The crags and peaks of the Blue Ridge stand like everlasting monuments to the native honesty of his warm and generous heart.

As a member of the Committee on Agriculture, he was in a position to serve his constituents in a substantial way, and his service was always at the command of his people. No member of the House was more deeply interested in the proposed Appalachian Forest Reserve than was Mr. MOODY, because that measure was of more importance to his people than any other that has been before this Congress. Not only the people of his own Congressional district, but all the millions who dwell between the mountains and the sea are indebted to him for his untiring efforts in support of this measure, which is of such vast importance to them.

Of course no words that any member of this Congress could utter would lessen the grief of the stricken wife and children, but it may be some consolation to them to know that he was honored among those with whom he labored, and who knew the nature of his duties, and the manner in which he performed them. He was in the midst of his manhood, and at his post of duty, when Death, which must come sooner or later to each one of us, came rapping at his door, and he has crossed over the river, as we all hope and believe, to begin the better life.

There is no death! The stars go down
To rise upon some other shore,
And bright in Heaven's jeweled crown
They shine forevermore.

There is no death! The forest leaves
Convert to life the viewless air;
The rocks disorganize to feed
The hungry moss they bear.

There is no death! The dust we tread
Shall change beneath the summer showers
To golden grain or mellow fruits
Or rainbow-tinted flowers.

There is no death! The leaves may fall,
The flowers may fade and pass away—
They only wait through wintry hours
The warm, sweet breath of May.

The Trusts.

OF

HON. JOHN F. RIXEY,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 7, 1903,

On the bill (H. R. 17) requiring all corporations engaged in interstate commerce to file returns with the Secretary of the Treasury, disclosing their true financial condition, and of their capital stock, and imposing a tax upon such as have outstanding capital stock unpaid in whole or in part—

Mr. RIXEY said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: During the first session of the present Congress much interest centered around our foreign policy. Many of us thought it was contrary to the principles of the Government to own and hold by force as colonies and vassals islands and people on the continent of Asia. In addition to the traditions and limitations of the Constitution, many of us believed it was not to our interest from a commercial and pecuniary standpoint. It is estimated that we have already spent during the five years on war and warfare $700,000,000, and I believe the statement to be correct that in eight years, from 1898 to 1905, we shall have spent on war and warfare a sum which, could it have been so applied, would have paid off the whole interest-bearing debt of the United States in the same period.

This estimate does not and can not include any computation for the frightful loss of life incident to service in the Tropics. The deaths by bullets have been comparatively few, but by disease frightful indeed; nor does it take into consideration the many hundreds who have returned to the United States as imbeciles or lunatics, or those with health so shattered that suicide has been the fate of many once-promising youths.

We are proceeding to govern these islands under a decision of a bare majority of one of the Supreme Court. Many of us fear that inroads have been made upon the Constitution and its underpinning shaken. During the first session of the present Congress able and patriotic speeches were made to arouse the people to the peril of the sea upon which they were rapidly drifting, but the indifference, not to say complacency, with which this whole subject is now viewed only shows the truth of the couplet:

Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As to be hated needs but to be seen;
Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

For the time being the foreign policy of the Government, the enlargement of the Army and Navy, and many other questions of great importance were apparently lost sight of. A question of grave domestic concern required redress. For many years it has been justly believed and contended that the tariff laws of this country were used to enable the manufacturers to extort from the consumers a greater price than was reasonable and just.

This was bad enough; but within the past two years evidence has multiplied that this was not only true, but that these same manufacturers, enjoying the protection of our laws, were so little grateful to their benefactors, the American people, that they sold the same kind of goods to foreigners at less price, notwithstanding the fact additional expenses were necessarily incurred in shipping the goods to foreign countries. It is difficult to realize a more exasperating condition of affairs, and it is little wonder that the correction of this condition at once commended itself to the American people as of immediate importance.

The canvass which followed was largely upon this evil, and I would not be wide of the mark to say that all who participated in the debates before the people freely admitted a remedy should be found and applied. Few denied the existence of the deplorable condition that goods manufactured in the United States were ofttimes exported and sold to foreigners at much less price than to our own people. The proof that such was the fact was overwhelming, and I here give a table showing some of these differences:

Cultivators	$11.00	$8.40
Plows	14.00	12.60
Axes (dozen)	8.25	7.20
Kettles	1.40	.85
Wire nails (100 pounds)	2.25	1.35
Table knives (gross)	15.00	12.00
Horse nails (pound)	.17	.14
Barbed wire (100 pounds)	3.00	2.00
Rivets (100 pounds)	10.00	5.55
Wire rope (coil)	12.00	5.00
Lead (100 pounds)	4.00	2.00
Shovels (dozen)	7.50	5.80
Axle grease (pound)	.08	.04
Washboards (dozen)	3.00	1.70
Meat choppers	2.70	1.50
Barbed wire (100 pounds)	3.00	2.20
Clocks (alarm)	.60	.30
Lawn mowers	4.25	2.75
Fruit jars (Mason's, dozen)	.90	.55

The question first suggested was how such a condition could be possible. It is not denied that, notwithstanding the tariff, if competition were entirely free and untrammeled, goods could be bought at cost with reasonable profit added. The true explanation is that competition in the United States in many lines has been stifled and killed, while the prohibitive Dingley tariff prevents the entrance of foreign competition. This view, I believe, is adopted by the American people.

In addition to the Standard Oil trust and the sugar trust, to which we have all become more or less accustomed, and it almost seems reconciled, combinations are the order the day. Railroads cease competing, combine, and pool their issues and profits. As a consequence freights have been and are being advanced. Combinations have multiplied until almost all manufactured goods are controlled by trusts or combinations. They are numbered by the hundreds, and possibly by the thousands. The operation is simple enough. The few manufacturers of any one line of goods get together and agree to form a combine and divide expenses and profits. If anyone in that branch of trade refuses to come in, the example of the Standard Oil Company is followed—he is squeezed, pushed to the wall, and crushed.

A few examples of this kind are all that is necessary for the success of all others. Men called promoters have come to the front to engineer the deals and form the combinations. They are paid thousands, tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands, and rumor, seemingly well founded, says, in several instances, millions of dollars. It is stated, and I do not think that it has ever been denied, that Mr. J. P. Morgan was paid $10,000,000 for engineering the steel trust, several millions for floating the harvester combine, and I suppose that no one knows but himself, and perhaps not he, how many millions for perfecting the combine of Eastern railroads or the international shipping combine. What he has done on a larger scale hundreds of enterprising promoters have done on smaller scales. All have to be paid, and the sums aggregate many millions. Sometimes the money is provided by an issue of stock sold at good prices. This stock, representing no real value, has to pay dividends, and dividends have to be secured by increased prices. Then larger dividends on these fictitious values are desired and secured by adding to the price of the trust-controlled articles.

It is not to be denied that combinations based on honest values could sell at less prices than many independent concerns, because the expenses are lessened. But the desire, by these "soulless corporations," for gain—to become rich rapidly—comes in as a factor, and seems to know no limits but the ability of the people to pay. While this is true of the home market, there is the best evidence of discrimination in favor of foreigners. Mr. Charles M. Schwab, president of the United States Steel Corporation, before the Industrial Commission, May 11, 1901, said:

Q. Is it a fact generally true of all exporters in this country that they do sell at lower prices in foreign markets than they do in the home market?
A. That is true, perfectly true. * * *
Q. Would you say that when business is in a normal condition the export prices are regularly somewhat lower than home prices?
A. Oh, yes; always.
Q. Suppose you take the case of steel rails. Could you give us about the difference between the export and domestic price?
A. I would have to make a guess; I do not know definitely. The export price was about $23 a ton.
Q. And the price here?
A. Was $26 and $28.
Q. At the same time?
A. At the same time.

And November 14, 1899, John W. Gates, of the same corporation, said that prices of wire nails had been doubled; that his company furnished England with 60 per cent of her supply; that goods were sold lower to foreigners; that his company had a monopoly of the barbed-wire business, etc. The Baltimore Sun, a very conservative newspaper, says of these conditions:

For a keg of wire nails the purchaser in the United States is compelled to pay $2.25. The foreigner can buy the same quantity and quality of nails for $1.30. The American price for a coil of rope is $12. The foreigner can purchase it for $5. For $2 our combine will give the foreigner 100 pounds of lead; the American, however, must pay $4. The man across the Atlantic can buy a dozen American shovels for $5.80; the man in the United States must pay $7.50. American washboards sell in Europe for $1.70 a dozen; in the United States, for $3 a dozen. Our tin-plate trust will sell the European purchaser 100 pounds of tin plate for $3.19. When the American buyer gives an order he must pay the trust $4.19 a hundred pounds. The price of typewriters in the United States is $100, in Europe $55. The foreigner can buy an American sewing machine for $17. The purchaser in the United States must pay $40. Americans have to pay $4.25 for a lawn mower. Our Napoleons of industry graciously permit the foreigner to purchase a lawn mower for $2.75.

This is an abuse which American consumers, who are heavily taxed to maintain the high profits of the industrial combinations, will not tolerate indefinitely.

Shall Americans pay double prices for ordinary commodities in order that our Napoleons of industry may capture the European markets? Shall a tariff system which plunders the American citizen for the benefit of Europeans be perpetuated? That is the issue, and it touches the sensitive pocket nerve of every American.

Without stopping to give other instances of the extortion of the trusts, which could be multipied indefinitely, it is pertinent to inquire here what figure the tariff plays in this extortion. I think it will be clearly seen from a bare statement of the facts that it makes the trust conditions possible, and is therefore responsible for it. The duty on wire nails is 50 cents on the hundred pounds, and on barbed wire $1.25 per hundred pounds. In effect a prohibitive tariff affords a complete shelter to the American steel trust and accounts for the rise in prices since the combine. This condition is duplicated in hundreds of articles now controlled by trusts which are sheltered by the great tariff, which makes outside competition impossible. The great injustice to the American people of such a condition of affairs could but arouse them to demand relief. In many sections of the country the Republicans united with the Democrats in demanding protection against the combines. In Iowa the Republican State convention of 1901 declared:

We favor * * * any modification of the tariff schedules that may be required to prevent their affording shelter to monopoly.

And in 1902 the Republican convention of that State reiterated its demand for tariff revision in such cases. In many sections Republican candidates assured the people that they would vote for tariff revision wherever it sheltered a trust or monopoly, and it is probably due largely to this promise that the Republicans secured a majority in the Congressional election.

Senator VEST said the tariff is—

An interdependent mutuality of greed. When you once establish it, it is established for all time to come, never to be reduced, if it is possible to prevent reduction. The protected industries are like a brood of English sparrows, when one gives a cry of distress the air is darkened with the whole brood rushing to its rescue. When you attack the trust on peanuts, you must encounter the trusts on salt, lumber, wire, meats, and all the necessaries of life.

How will the promise of reform be fulfilled? There is little doubt that the tariff will remain as it is in all essential particulars as long as the Republicans control.

It was in view of the widespread interest in the trust and tariff questions that the annual message of the President was awaited with impatience. It is not putting it too strongly to state that upon these subjects it is distinctly a disappointing message to the people, including many of the rank and file of the Republican party. It can be but gratifying to Senator HANNA and his followers who are "standing pat" and "letting well enough alone," also to the trusts, combines, and monopolies, all of which are for "standing pat" and "letting well enough alone."

The message is also, it seems to me, to some extent contradictory. As stated by a high-protection paper, "He uses vigorous language concerning trusts and the tariff, but it is along the line of conservatism. He carefully avoids sentiments that might bring disturbances to business interests;" or, as was stated by a very prominent Wall street broker, "The message is entirely satisfactory to Wall street, as it would not disturb business conditions." Entirely satisfactory, evidently, to the protected classes. From the generalities of the President's message it may be gathered that his recommendations for the regulation of the trusts are publicity and the extension of the interstate-commerce law.

As to publicity, we already know that a large part of the trust capital is watered stock, representing no actual value; that promoters receive fortunes for successfully engineering a consolidation of interests; that as soon as competition is stifled prices are raised and consumers victimized, and that goods are sold to foreigners at less price than to our own people. We now know to a large extent what the Littlefield bill proposes to give us in this respect. Public opinion is aroused against the evils of the trusts, but so long as the voters are satisfied with "publicity" the trusts can well be satisfied also, and doubtless are more than pleased with a recommendation for what the people already have, to some extent at least, "publicity" of the evils of the trusts.

The other recommendation, to strengthen the interstate-commerce law, meets my hearty approval. That Commission should have more power in dealing with the questions of railroad rates and interstate commerce; and I indorse the provisions of the Littlefield bill prohibiting rebates. But when this is done it will still fall far short of what I think it should do for controlling and neutralizing the trust evils.

The President is emphatically against the true remedy—tariff reduction. His language is:

> One proposition advocated has been the reduction of the tariff as a means of reaching the evils of the trusts which fall within the category I have described. Not merely would this be wholly ineffectual, but the diversion of our efforts in such a direction would mean the abandonment of all intelligent attempt to do away with their evils.

The Littlefield bill makes no provision for tariff reduction in any case, and whatever pledges the Republican party has made in that direction are violated and broken.

Congress is the only body of which relief can be demanded. Repressive laws—criminal in their nature—should be passed, imposing fines and imprisonment on violators of the antitrust laws. It is stated that five-sixths of all the existing trusts have been formed since the passage of the Sherman antitrust law. The process of criminal prosecution, however, is slow. While one prosecution drags its slow length along the people are being victimized in many other ways by many other trusts.

The remedies I would suggest and urge are—

(1) An automatic, self-acting provision which will take from the extortionists the tariff protection which places the people at their mercy.

(2) A tax upon every trust or combination formed to control the market and fix prices. Congress has the power over interstate commerce and can regulate it as it sees fit. "The power to tax is the power to destroy." The tax by Congress of 10 per cent on the issue of State banks stopped all issue of the State banks. A tax or license on trusts engaged in interstate business might make trusts as unprofitable as the 10 per cent tax made State bank issues.

(3) A tax upon incomes. This would strike the great profits and dividends of watered stock and combined capital. I will not stop now to argue the justice of this tax. Its justice is almost self-evident. This tax has, however, after being upheld repeatedly by various decisions of the Supreme Court, been held unconstitutional by a majority of one of that same court.

For the time being this remedy may not be practical; but I mention it here in order to keep it before the people. The demand for this tax should be repeated and reiterated over and over and over again until by constitutional amendment or otherwise Congress is given the power to tax incomes, and thus in the exercise of a graduated income tax control, and, if need be, destroy trusts and combinations. In addition, the time may come when the necessities of the Government may require an income tax for its support, and Congress should have the power to levy it.

As to the first of these proposed remedies. Let it be provided that whenever an article is controlled by a trust with a view to increasing the price thereof to the consumer, it shall at once go upon the free list and there remain until satisfactory evidence is presented to show that competition is no longer stifled and the article no longer controlled by a trust or combination. The passage of such a law would make trusts unprofitable, and as a consequence undesirable. The high-fed promoters would go out of business; competition would again be opened; new enterprises spring up, giving employment to many, and affording protection, by competition, to the consumer.

The contention is, however, made that the tariff as it now exists, with its protection to combinations and monopolies, is too sacred and vital to the prosperity of the country to be in any way even questioned or considered. We are told that if it were known that Congress would seriously consider an amendment to the tariff laws that at once the whole business interests of the country would be thrown into a chaotic condition and that a financial panic with industrial depression and distress would be the inevitable consequence. Whence comes this contention? The people who have grown rich under these abnormal conditions can easily afford to expend a few millions in securing followers and advocates of their theories. Their riches—the result of exorbitant prices paid by consumers—have come easily, and they are willing to pay, if necessary, for a continuation of such favors. The pretension is made that the consumer, who, tired of being victimized by a trust, insists on lowering the tariff which makes possible such a condition, is an enemy of the prosperity of his country.

The alteration and change in tariff laws have in the past been of frequent occurrence. From 1861 to 1883, inclusive—twenty-three years—41 tariff laws were enacted, only 7 of which, however, were of any considerable importance. The fact is that from the foundation of the Government the making and changing of tariffs have probably occupied more of the time of Congress than any other one subject. It has ever been a fruitful source of discussion and serious consideration, and I will consider it a bad omen, an indication of the decadence of independent thought, an indication of the surrender of the rights of the people to monopolistic greed and corruption, whenever the Congress refuses to consider tariff revision for fear of a panic from the interested and protected sources. It is time to disturb some of the combinations. It is time to take into consideration the disturbed interest of others besides combines.

The controlling idea of the advocates of the first and many of the succeeding tariffs was by it to provide revenue for the Government. Incidentally it was to provide protection to young or infant manufacturing industries. In introducing the first tariff bill in Congress in 1789 Mr. Madison said:

> The deficiency in our Treasury has been too notorious to make it necessary for me to animadvert upon that subject. Let us content ourselves with endeavoring to remedy the evil. To do this a national revenue must be obtained; but the system must be such a one that while it secures the object of revenue it shall not be oppressive to our constituents.

Too much emphasis can not be placed upon Mr. Madison's declaration, "But the system must be such a one that while it secures the object of revenue it shall not be oppressive to our constituents." Does the present tariff violate this test? Who doubts that it does? The tariff of 1789 covered comparatively few items, and the general level of duties was 5 per cent on value. On a few articles of luxury it was higher, the highest being 15 per cent on carriages. Changes were made, and during the war with England in 1812 the import duties were largely increased, in the hope that it would bring more revenue. From this time on the cry of the protected classes was protection to infant industries. Every man or industry that desired favoritism was an infant. In many cases the cry was honest, in many others not. The tariff act of 1816 was about 20 per cent, and was thought to be extreme, but was advocated by Madison, Calhoun, and Clay as a temporary measure to be soon reduced.

Then followed other tariff acts, until in 1833 the compromise act agreed on a sliding scale until 15 or 20 per cent should be reached.

In 1864 the great war tariff of 47 per cent was enacted. This was considered very extreme and justified solely because of the exigencies of the war. In 1870 Senator Morrill, the author of the war tariff, said:

> It is a mistake of the friends of a sound tariff to insist on the extreme rates imposed during the war if less will raise the revenue desired.

In 1870 President Garfield, then a Representative from Ohio, added his earnest support for reduction, saying:'

> After studying the whole subject as carefully as I am able, I am firmly of the opinion that the wisest thing that the protectionists in the House can do is to unite on a moderate reduction of the duties on imported articles. * * *

But instead of following this advice and reducing the war tariff of 47 per cent, the Dingley bill practically doubles it.

Other changes were made from time to time, notably the tariff act of 1883; but it remained for the tariff of 1890, known as the McKinley tariff, to take advanced position, throw off all disguises, and boldly show that its sole purpose was protection—an exclusive market. That tariff, with its prototype, only a little more extreme, the Dingley law, now constitutes in large measure the Republican test of party fealty. The favored, privileged, and protected classes, all enjoying special privileges, may all be said to be enlisted under the banner of Republican protection, while the slogan of democracy is still "equal rights to all and special privileges to none."

The evolution in the doctrine of protection furnishes a striking example of how a united, compact minority can by persistent effort and never-ceasing activity secure practical control of the Government and shape its policy in their own interests and contrary to that of a large majority of the people. Henry Clay was an advocate of the tariff of his day, and is sometimes referred to as the father of the protective-tariff idea. In 1833 he said:

The theory of protection supposes that after a certain time the protected manufacturers will have acquired such strength and protection as will enable them subsequently, unaided, to stand against foreign competition.

Again in 1840 he said:

No one, Mr. President, in the commencement of the protective policy ever supposed that it was to be perpetual.

Again in 1843 he said:

My opinion that there is no danger hereafter of a high tariff is founded on the gratifying fact that our manufacturers have now taken a deep root. In their infancy they needed a greater measure of protection, but as they grow and advance they acquire strength and stability, and consequently will require less protection. Even now some branches of them are able to maintain in distant markets successful competition with rival foreign manufacturers.

When Clay made this speech in 1843 the tariff was something over 20 per cent. Where would he be found to-day when it is shown that under the Dingley tariff of about 100 per cent these century-old but still "infant industries" are underselling the foreign manufacturers in their own market and extorting unconscionable profits from the American people?

Hon. J. W. BABCOCK, a Representative from Wisconsin, a member of the Ways and Means Committee, which has jurisdiction of bills to revise the tariff, and chairman of the Congressional Republican committee, said, in 1901:

By the aid of the tariff, manufacturers can fix extortionate prices in the domestic market.

And he asks the question, "Shall we continue a tariff on articles that are in fact articles of export?"

The author of the present law, Mr. Dingley, is reported upon good authority to have said that he realized that many of the schedules were too high, and that they had been made so purposely to enable the Government to arrange treaties of reciprocity with foreign countries.

It has been well said that the tariff is the "shelter of the trusts," and it stands to reason, as stated by Senator Plumb of Kansas, in 1891, "I do not know of any better way to start in at least to reduce the exactions of trusts than to cut down the shelter behind which trusts are created."

Was Havemeyer, president of the great sugar trust, right when he said:

The mother of all trusts is the customs tariff bill. * * * It is the Government, through the tariff laws, which plunders the people, and the trusts, etc., are merely the machinery for doing it.

Governor Mount, of Indiana, in 1899 said:

I emphatically favor removing all tariff protection from every industry that belongs to a combination formed in restraint of trade.

Mr. A. B. Farquhar, the head of a great manufacturing plant for manufacturing agricultural implements, wrote in 1890:

The fact is that our protective laws are a monstrous swindle upon the agricultural community. As a manufacturer I was inclined to say nothing on the subject for the reason that it was rational to suppose if anybody was benefited it was the manufacturing class, to which I belong. But, as I have explained, the farmer is being destroyed. We are killing the goose for the golden egg. And I honestly believe now that it is to the interest of the manufacturers themselves to eliminate the protective feature from our tariff laws.

It has been said—that a tariff that makes millionaires and bleeds the people * * * is a monopolistic tariff and an outrage on the American people.

Ben Butterworth, a former Representative in Congress from Ohio, said:

The manufacturers and the trusts get the protection and the profits from the tariff; the farmer gets the husks and the humbug.

The American Machinist in 1899 said:

Just why American manufacturers will sell machinery and other goods from 10 to 30 per cent cheaper in Europe than they will sell them to be used at home is rather puzzling; but anyone curious in the matter can easily enough find out that many of them do that. It may be necessary to cut prices in order to secure trade from abroad, but it is likely to strike the American purchaser as being a little rough on him.

The Engineering and Mining Journal of March 15, 1890, complained of the system, to wit:

As soon as an industry has obtained a position where it can more than supply our home market, and has to send its goods abroad, where they compete with those of foreign manufacturers, it is evident that they are either giving the foreigners the benefit of lower rates than they do our own people or that they are able to get along at home without any protection from foreign manufacturers. It is not fair that our own people should be made to pay more than foreigners for the products of our own land.

Hon. J. M. Rusk, once a member of Congress and later Secretary of Agriculture, in 1890, said:

* * * This same combination (National Harvester Trust) is now selling, or offering to sell, machinery in Russia, and Australia, and other wheat-growing countries at a lower figure than they do in this country. * * * The first thing the farmer will do when he is acquainted with the facts will be to make a howl against trusts and protection that does not protect.

Hon. William E. Chandler, a Republican and Senator from New Hampshire, said, in 1899:

* * * We have combinations covering everything, from sugar and lead to brooms and soap and coffins. The only fortunes are those that are made by the multimillionaires who control trusts.

And two days later he said:

* * * These enormous combinations of capital control the politics of the country, nominate the candidates, then furnish the means to carry the elections, and later direct all legislation, State and national, and dominate the use of all executive power.

"Carry the elections, dictate legislation, State and national, and dominate the use of all executive power." A dire indictment of the great power of the trusts, and if true fraught with fearful consequences to the American people. It does seem, indeed, that the trusts and great combinations "carry the elections," and from the difficulty of securing legislation for their control that they "dictate legislation."

How long is this condition to continue? Webster said that the freest of governments would not long be acceptable if the tendency of the laws be to create a rapid accumulation of property in a few hands, rendering the majority of the population dependent. Is a revolution necessary to secure a return to a "government of the people, for the people, and by the people?" I can not believe it. I have an abiding faith in the honesty, integrity, patriotism, and courage of the American people. It is true they are long suffering and slow to move. There is no central organization and control among the farmers as with trusts and combinations; but when once thoroughly aroused to a deep sense of injustice and wrong not all of the machinery and organization of political interests can stem the avalanche brought on by popular indignation. The watchword will then be, "Let no man be put in office who is in sympathy with trusts and trust makers." They can be identified.

It is manifest that, notwithstanding all the professions of the Republicans and the anteelection promises of the candidates of that political party, no tariff revision, looking to the control of trusts and consequent protection of the people, is to be had at this session or, as many believe, at the next session of Congress. No longer, then, can the people listen to the discredited cry of the protectionist that "the tariff should be revised by its friends." This is what ex-President Cleveland calls a "hoary-headed, bloated, and malodorous old fraud and pretense." Who are the friends of the sugar trust but the people who are stockholders and dividend receivers? Who of the steel trust? Not the farmers, who pay about 100 per cent more for their wire and nails than they would have to pay but for this 100 per cent tariff. Oh, no! The friends of the steel trust must reform that particular tariff schedule! And so on throughout the whole list. Suppose the people continue to trust these "friends" to reform these tariff schedules. If changed at all, it would likely be after the example of the Jewish king, who replied to his people complaining of the great burdens imposed upon them by his father, "My little finger shall be thicker than my father's loins."

Why did the President, let me ask, in his annual message upon the reassembling of Congress in December, recommend that the tariff of 67 cents per ton on coal be entirely removed and coal placed on the free list, and why has it been done, unless for the reason that the tariff protects the coal combine to that extent and that it is a charge upon the consumer? This tariff is probably about 20 per cent ad valorem. A tariff of 100 per cent doubles the price at which the foreign article can be sold here. A combine here enables the seller to double the price to the consumer, and this in many instances is done. Is it any wonder that these protected interests grow richer year by year until it is sometimes said that all of the great fortunes are made in this way? It seems, indeed, to be the fast express to fortune and to favor.

The other classes in any other country in the world would grow poorer; but America is a country of such wonderful resources and possibilities, and the earth is so generous, that it can thrive under conditions which would impoverish any other country. The question should be, Do present conditions give to all classes of the people their share of opportunity for prosperity and wealth? Do favored classes enjoy exceptional advantages as the result of legislation, and have these favored classes taken advantage of such legislation to impose unjust burdens upon other classes?

It is the privilege of an intelligent people to correct these conditions. They can do so. Let us remember that in a short twelve months another canvass will have opened, and that the election of a President and House of Representatives committed to tariff reform will control the trusts and furnish, as I believe, a solution of the trust problem.

The great combinations, however, will not surrender without a contest; but let the people be on their guard, and let them vote for no political party or man who accepts contributions to the campaign from protected interests. "The borrower is servant unto the lender," and the beneficiary of a gift from an interested source is under obligations. Eternal vigilance is the price of more things than liberty. If the people will exercise this vigilance redress against existing conditions will be secured, and the tariff be adjusted for purposes of revenue, limited to the needs of the Government, and with a view to crushing out unlawful combinations, by whatever names they may be designated.

I would not cripple worthy enterprises, honestly conducted and properly safeguarded, but the laws of this country should not be a shelter for monopoly, greed, and extortion. Nor would I have the laws so written that a favored class should reap its millions by improper burdens upon the people. France tried that, and when the people complained they were told they could eat grass. The result was revolution. With the ballot let us reverse the present policy of the Government and insist on trust control and a tariff for revenue. Upon such a platform all opponents of favoritism, paternalism, and unjust burdens can and should unite.

Indian Appropriation Bill.

OF
HON. MARCUS A. SMITH, OF ARIZONA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, January 28, 1903.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 15804) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes—

Mr. SMITH of Arizona said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I move to amend by striking out the last word. I wish to say to the chairman of the Indian Committee that I was unavoidably detained from the House at the time of the general debate. I should like unanimous consent now to submit a few remarks on a matter not exactly germane to this bill. I shall consume very little time.

Mr. SHERMAN. So far as I am concerned, I shall not object to the gentleman having a greater time than five minutes to discuss the bill or any portion of it; but I question whether it is wise to open up this bill now to general debate in the sense in which we understand that term.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, if I could have been here at the time of general debate upon this bill I would have been, and I will state very plainly that my object in taking the floor here at this time, having no other convenient season to do it, is to answer some charges made publicly and notoriously against the credit and financial standing of the people who are represented simply by a Delegate in the Congress of the United States, and I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to address the committee for ten minutes without being limited to the subject embraced in the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I think it is generally known in this body that I have been somewhat interested in the application of the Territory of Arizona for statehood. It has been developed during debate on this question, in the public press and elsewhere, that injustice has constantly been done, misleading statements made, and false conclusions forced on the country as to the propriety of permitting the people of the Territory of Arizona to enjoy the privileges of a State. Charges have been made of Arizona being peopled with repudiationists, and these charges are based upon certain railroad bonds issued by the county of Pima. These accusations have been gravely made by men who ought to know better, who hold positions of such distinction as to have known better if they had inquired into the matter.

I say to them, wherever they may be, that not one single debt she ever owed has been repudiated or dishonored, not one dollar of interest on any obligation of hers but has been fully met. A hord of bond sharps, owning bonds they knew to be fraudulent, owning bonds that they knew there was no obligation on the part of the Territory to pay, came to the Congress of the United States and had these bonds validated after they had been declared invalid by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Lewis v. The County of Pima, 155 United States Supreme Court Reports.

The history of that was simply this: The Territorial legislature, acting beyond its power, provided that the county of Pima should issue bonds to aid in the construction of a railroad from the city of Tucson to the city of Globe. The legislature had no power to do it. The county had no power to issue the bonds. The county never recognized the bonds. The county claimed it never delivered the bonds. Yet a man named Lewis, who held them, brought suit against the county for their enforcement. It developed in that suit that the railroad had never been built, but that 10 miles of a narrow gauge had been laid through the mesquite bushes, in order to have the county issue $50,000 worth of bonds and turn them over in return for the worthless railroad bonds. How they ever got hold of the balance of the bonds nobody knows.

The county refused to pay them. Suit was brought. That suit went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that court decided that the bonds were a fraud and void ab initio. Then the bondholders came to Congress—the gentlemen who are here now in this city, or were yesterday—came before the two branches of Congress and had a bill passed which Arizona knew nothing about, and a bill which I myself had time and time again defeated in committees of this House. Congress by that unwarranted act imposed that burden on the people of Arizona. The Supreme Court held that the act of Congress had validated the bonds which the Supreme Court had theretofore declared absolutely invalid. And out of this whole matter neither the county of Pima nor the people of Arizona ever received an inch of railroad nor a dollar of money.

Notwithstanding there has been saddled on it nearly $400,000 by the act of Congress, yet members of the Congress are found with impudence sufficient to charge us with repudiation when we appeal to the courts against outrage and infamous robbery. Furthermore, the same "gentlemen" who were pressing the payment of the bonds, and through whose influence the enabling act was passed, reached the ears of distinguished gentlemen in power very easily, and we find their woes echoed yesterday.

They can catch the ear of certain statesmen with a plea for payment of a fraudulent bond, and have caught public attention through clamor for the money which was never owed them. This same gentleman who is here asking by his own published interview that the President interpose his objection to statehood unless we give further guarantees on the part of the State, he has been heard in many quarters, yet 175,000 people who are asking to be liberated from this condition are shown less attention at the hands of Congress. Their voice can not reach that sympathetic ear, and when we tell you to quit hitting us on the head with a hammer you tell us that we are bad boys and ought to behave ourselves better. That is the position in which Arizona is placed. A colloquy occurred in debate in another forum on yesterday. It is as follows:

Q. The money was raised on the bonds?
A. Certainly it was.
Q. There is no question as to that?
A. None whatever.
Q. And paid over in good faith?
A. Certainly.
Q. And whether it was appropriated and used for the completion of a railroad or not, the localities had the benefit of it?

Now, in that colloquy the answer to every question is absolutely not true. The people never got a dollar of it. They never got a railroad. They denounced it from the first and succeeded in defeating it through the agency of the Supreme Court of the United States, until Congress made it good. Those bonds will be issued because the Supreme Court so commands and for no other reason on the earth. Again, it is asked in a place where people ought to know better:

Q. Were they the loan commission chosen from the people of Arizona? Were they not selected by the voters?
A. Why, certainly they were.

Sirs, think of such a question and such an answer from such a source. It shows slightly the difficulties which confront us.

That answer is absolutely untrue. The commission is composed of a governor, appointed by the President at Washington, a secretary of state, appointed by the President at Washington, an auditor, appointed by the governor who was appointed by the President at Washington. These are the gentlemen that the wise legislation of Congress provides to handle the money of the people of the Territory of Arizona. I make no criticism of the present board. They are honest men, and I know they hate to put this burden on the people. They were created by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. I read, and the gentleman who said it probably will recognize it if he sees it. He says, among other things, that—

The history of the bonds would not be considered creditable to any community, regardless of whether they were held by Mr. Coler or anyone else, and he was pleased that the question had been brought out, because, he added, "it throws a strong if not a pleasing light upon the character of the people affected."

A pleasing light! "I thank thee for teaching me that word." And now, instead of repudiating even that, we have offered to bond according to the Supreme Court mandate. But that is not enough for the daughters of the horse leech. This same Coler was here no longer ago than yesterday, and the echo of that gentleman's voice has been heard in public since.

When the decision of the Supreme Court came down it was found that under that act of Congress these bonds had become vitalized, Congress being all powerful in Territorial legislation, and that under that act the Territory must pay them, and ordered a new board of funding commissioners, the old board having already been repealed by the Territorial act, and made these same public appointees of the President the board to carry on this business. And when the Supreme Court sent down its mandate it said that the Territory was responsible for the debt and the interest thereon.

When that mandate comes from the supreme court of the Territory to these commissioners, it orders them by some hocus pocus not only to give the debt with its accrued interest, but to give the compound interest on every coupon, making a difference of $100,000, a pure gratuity, stuck into this mandate, as our people claim, without the consent of any court and without any reason on earth. Now, we will not pay them that $100,000 extra if we can help it; but these gentlemen are visiting Washington and seeking ears that listen and appealing to voices that are heard. That is some of this beautiful piece of repudiation of which those people are guilty.

I wish there was some way and they wish there was some way by which that fraud could be met, and I shall yet appeal to this House until I can get a hearing, and to another body, to see if that very act by which those bonds have been vitalized can not be repealed or the United States pay the money that it imposed gratuitously and without reason to be paid by people who have nothing but a mere voice in this body. [Applause.]

Tuesday, February 10, 1903.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the sundry civil appropriation bill—

Mr. SMITH of Arizona said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The other day I took occasion here to deny certain charges that had been made against Arizona in connection with certain railroad bonds, and I avail myself of this first opportunity to speak further on that matter and submit other observations pertinent to questions in which that Territory is now so deeply and vitally interested. I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read an interview which appeared recently in the Tucson Citizen with Mr. Rochester Ford. Mr. Ford is a gentleman of high character and great legal attainments, and has represented Pima County as its attorney in the fight against these bonds. It shows the case better than I could tell it.

The Clerk read as follows:

PIMA NARROW-GAUGE BOND SWINDLE.

Mr. Rochester Ford was requested to make a statement regarding the telegram in last night's Citizen to the effect that Mr. Bird S. Coler, one of the holders of the Pima County narrow-guage bonds, was asserting to the President and members of Congress that the officials of the Territory of Arizona are endeavoring to postpone indefinitely, if not actually to avoid, payment of these bonds, for which reason Mr. Coler was opposing the admission of Arizona as a State.

Mr. Ford gave the facts as follows:

"I read in the telegram that 'it is said by Mr. Coler that obstacles are being placed continually in the way of a satisfaction of the judgment of the Supreme Court by the authorities of the Territory.' Such a statement is absolutely without foundation, and no one knows this better than Mr. Coler himself and his attorneys. Under the decision of the courts neither the courts themselves nor the legislature of Arizona can prevent the funding of these bonds. The Congressional funding act of 1896 contained the command that the bonds should be funded, and the courts have held that the loan commission is operating under an act of Congress. The Arizona legislature, which created the loan commission, passed a bill to repeal it, but the Supreme Court held that this could not be done, and that the commission continued in existence.

"The funding of the bonds is thus, as above stated, in the hands of the loan commission, a Congressional body, and in no wise can the people of Arizona control its action. The commission is composed of three high-toned, honorable gentlemen, who are doing their duty in the matter. They gave a hearing to all parties, and the attorney for the bondholders appeared, urging the funding of the bonds, and presented a mandate ordering the loan commission to fund them, when it was discovered that an attempt had been made on the part of the bondholders to change the language of the decree which had been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

"The mandate presented to Governor Brodie and other members of the loan commission contained a provision for the funding of the interest on coupons, which had been interpolated after the final judgment and decree. This fact was brought to the attention of the supreme court of Arizona by a motion to strike out the additional words which had been inserted, and the motion was promptly and unanimously granted by the court. Any delay in the matter of funding the bonds is thus not due to the loan commission, but to the unblushing attempt on the part of the bondholders to change the record of the court. The following is a copy of the order of the court granting the motion:

"'Per Curiam:

"'We think the mandate in this case should conform in its terms to the judgment entered herein and reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

"'The motion of the loan commission in this case does not present for our consideration the question of the proper construction to be given to the judgment in this case, nor was such question argued before us on this motion on behalf of the loan commission. The only question presented by the motion is as to the form of the mandate issued by this court. We do not think it is proper for the court at this time to go outside of the single question presented by the motion and to decide what is the legal effect of the judgment.

"'If the decision of this question is material, it will be considered if presented.

"'The motion will be granted and the mandate corrected to conform in terms to the judgment.'

"From my reading I am familiar with the history of the Tweed régime in New York City, with the municipal frauds in St. Louis, and with the doings of ex-Mayor Ames and his coconspirators in Minneapolis, and after some years of investigation I know most of the facts connected with this Narrow Gauge bond steal. It is my opinion that the boodlers never walked the streets of any of the cities named who surpassed for bald rascality the engineers of this bond fraud.

"From its inception to the latest attempt to change the record of the court, it simply swelters in corruption. The Congressional act of 1896, which makes it obligatory to fund these bonds, invalid and fraudulent as they are, was passed ostensibly in response to a memorial from the legislature of Arizona, but was restricted in its terms to bonds the validity of which had been acknowledged by the payment of interest thereon. As a matter of fact, however, and as to this I speak with definite information, the act was prepared by the holders of these Narrow Gauge bonds, to serve their private purposes, and what on its face is an act of Congress for the relief of the Territory is in reality a bill drawn and lobbied through by the holders of these bonds to compel the people of the Territory to pay an obligation which the courts had declared to be void."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I can not and will not tamely submit to charges of repudiation of just debts by my constituents, for the charge is scandalously and slanderously false. This accusation against the honesty of the people of Arizona comes with doubtful grace from a man who, in a public speech just delivered before another tribunal, confesses that he was a member of the subcommittee that drafted a plank in the Republican national platform promising statehood to these Territories and then proceeds by specious and ingenious arguments to show why he is not bound, and why the lawmaking power should not be bound, and how the Republican party was not morally bound to carry out the provisions which he himself had formulated for it, and which it deliberately and most solemnly made, not to one person, not to one district, not to one State, but to the great Republican party, of which he is "a strong, if not a pleasing, light;" yea, a promise to these Territories, made before 75,000,000 of Americans and in the very presence of the civilized world.

He needed our help then as much as these bond buyers need his help now. I never could work up any respect for Jacob at the bedside of the dying Isaac. A blessing was in store for Esau. By the ingenious use of goatskin on his hands, his father being blind and his older brother "a hairy man," he deceived the patriarch, cheated his brother, and obtained the patriarchal blessing. So, in this case, the modern Jacob, wanting a blessing, sought it with the hands of Esau, but his voice is the voice of Jacob still.

He has said in effect that we failed to keep our promise to pay a debt, and are therefore unworthy of statehood. This statement is not true, but grant that it is true, we would at least have the moral and legal defense that there was no consideration. What defense has he or any other member of the Republican national convention when we demand of them that their promise be kept? They can not plead infancy, inability, ignorance, fraud, or any moral, equitable, or legal reason for failure.

I have more patience with old Jacob—for when the time came at last for the fulfillment of that promise by the very man who made it, and the only men who can keep it, we find some few of them, without just reason or excuse using every effort, regardless of all cost to their party honor or their country's good, deliberately opposing their solemn pledges and in the face of the world writing a lie across the public statement of their principles. This is just as true of any Democrat—if one can be found—as it is of the members of the subcommittee who drafted the Republican platform or any member of either convention who voted for the platform.

I protest against any lecture on the morals of Arizona, here or elsewhere, when it comes from lips confessing that a public promise to a whole people need not be kept by any person who made it or was a party to it.

I confess that the people of Arizona love money well enough to object to giving it to the people of New York, Connecticut, or even Massachusetts; but I pray God the time may never come when they shall love it so well that they will estimate it above every manly instinct and hold the voluntary payment of a fraudulent bond so high above every moral obligation and public promise that they will deny to a people who love money less a seat in their councils or a part in the free Government of our common country.

Mr. Chairman, the people for whom I speak and whose honor I am attempting to defend have no voice in the Senate of the United States and no vote here to express their will. I do not claim for them virtues above the balance of the American people, but I do acquit them of sniveling hypocrisy and canting self-praise evidencing itself by criticisms of other people's conduct and motives. They have not yet attained so exalted a peak of civilization that they are ready to condone the breach of a sacred promise and yet condemn to public infamy a community whose only offense is a protest against being plundered.

The rules of this House prohibit personal mention of the names of Senators or criticism of their speeches in the Senate. I have no intention to violate that rule, however strong my provocation; but in view of the fact that there is no one there who, by contact and long experience with the people, can speak from certain knowledge of their conditions, their surroundings, and their pressing interests, I can not remain silent. This reflection daily offers the strongest reasons and the most unanswerable argument for statehood.

No misstatement of the real facts of any case touching the Territories can go undisputed in this branch of Congress, but in the other the case is different, and I have a right to protest, as I do protest, before the great body of the American people against this horrible injustice and this needless wrong, and before them I protest against the breach of that promise of freedom made to us through their national conventions—their only mouthpiece. No special pleader from the ranks of prejudice or political exigency can abate the public sense of the obligations of both parties to the support of the pending statehood bill or palliate the national disgrace of their violation.

Many men of great distinction have served in the national conventions of both parties. Some act seriously, from honest principle, and deal seriously with the public, and they obtain and deserve public confidence. Others, unfortunately, treat platform promises as a mere device to catch votes, and brush them heedlessly aside when further deception is unnecessary. Not long ago I was thrilled by the honest, magnetic statement of a most distinguished gentleman from Ohio when he declared, in a great speech recently made, that when the word "Lie" was written across the national platform of his party it would not be in his handwriting. I commend him and his utterance to the admiration of his country and his party.

Again, on a solemn and yet intensely excited occasion I heard a gentleman from Pennsylvania, than whom none in America stands more prominently, say, while speaking of statehood, "that there was no occasion for further investigation or further delay; that the great jury of the American people in two conventions assembled had settled the question by the verdict in favor of statehood for Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma, and from that verdict, in our form of government, there is no honest appeal."

I heard the chairman of the Republican national committee say, in effect, that inasmuch as no great party issue was involved in the promise, and nobody paid attention to it in the campaign, that he was not bound nor was his party bound by it. I looked at once for another assault on Arizona for failure to pay on demand a stealing, fraudulent bond imposed on it by an act of Congress.

Further, I knew a young man once who, in his own estimation, was bigger than his party or anything else in the civilized world, whose self-imagined genius was only less luminous than the blazing sun in the heavens, who spent much time in trying to show that there was no promise of statehood contained in the Republican platform that the party or he himself was bound to respect at this time. I do not know whether he got the cue from the chairman of the Republican national committee, or the chairman got it from him; but however that may be, they both agree that the plain promise of statehood need not be kept because no issue was made of it in the last campaign.

In the name of common sense and decency, how could there be an issue on a question where both parties were agreed? What fool would talk about statehood in a campaign where both parties had solemnly promised statehood? Everybody knew the obligation of that promise, and I am proud here to record the fact that the Democratic party has done and is doing all a minority can do to keep that solemn obligation inviolate. If the Democratic party had left that plank out of its platform, the other would quickly have made an issue of it, and these apologists, these moral philosophers, would have been on the stump yelling anathemas at the Democrats who were repressing Western aspiration and shackling the limbs of the unborn States. Oh, yes, "it would have been different had it been otherwise."

Mr. Chairman, it has been charged that I gerrymandered the Territory in providing representation in the constitutional convention. I acquit the gentleman who made that charge of intentional misrepresentation of my conduct, but I must do it on a ground particularly distasteful to him, to wit, just simple, common, plain ignorance. When an alleged investigating committee lately made a record-breaking trip through Arizona, and stopped long enough in Tucson to draw a breath, a miserable, little, contemptible hypocrite by the name of L. C. Hughes had some reasons to offer against statehood, and of course gained ready entrance to the star chamber where the "investigation" was secretly being conducted.

His charge was that a gerrymander had been worked, and unfair apportionment of delegates to the constitutional convention was made in the omnibus bill. That committee was informed by several reputable gentlemen that Hughes was utterly irresponsible and unreliable, yet we find that miserable falsehood paraded as a reason why this bill should not pass. I have nothing to say about the "pioneers" who permitted themselves to be used against the interest of their country and in opposition to the unanimous wish of their neighbors. But I take this occasion to say once for all, that the charge that I took or attempted to take any part or personal advantage in providing delegates to the constitutional convention is absolutely false, and further assert that the charge has never been made by anybody in good faith or with pure purpose.

Three bills for the admission of Arizona have been passed by me through the House of Representatives. Every one of those bills were carefully scrutinized and no intimation of a gerrymander or suggestion of unfairness was ever made by anybody, either here or at home. Yet every one of those bills contained the identical constitutional convention membership that the present bill contains, and the delegates were apportioned and selected in the very same way. Whence comes this late discovery of a mare's nest? What motive underlies it all? The miserable littleness of the thing is sickening to honest men.

But this is not all. The legislature of Arizona several years ago provided for the holding of a constitutional convention, and such convention was held and the constitution framed and submitted to vote of the people and ratified by almost a unanimous vote. That Arizona legislature made exactly the same provision as to delegates to the convention that is contained in the present bill. If I had changed these established precedents I would have been likewise, and with more reason, accused of attempting to take an advantage.

Every one of the bills, including the present one, provides for a constitutional convention, identical in membership and county representation with the legislative assembly. I beg pardon of the House for consuming its time on a question of this sort, and I have spoken of it simply to show to what retreat opponents of statehood are driven when they use it, but with no intention of defending myself from the lies emanating from my own city, where my neighbors know the author and know him very well indeed.

THE INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

There are some other facts about that investigating committee that ought to be known, the main one being that no investigation was ever had and the people of the Territories believe none was ever intended, except in so far as to find something or anything on which to hang an argument against statehood. The report, I think, justifies their opinion. This investigating committee could have spent more time than it did in Arizona and New Mexico and passed Jules Verne's celebrated traveler on his eighty-day trip around the globe if they had all left Washington the same minute.

What an investigation that was. I saw part of it. No, I did not see any of it or hear any testimony by anybody, though I was whizzing along with it. Did you ever read that report? Not for its historic value but as a curiosity of literature I commend it to your very idle hours. I met the committee—I never could have overtaken it—at Phoenix and it remained there one day, the longest stop in all its record as far as I know, and "investigated" a police judge and some census enumerators, and had an interpreter with them scouring the town to see whether some Mexicans could not be found who could not speak English, and thus prove valuable witnesses for the purpose of the investigation.

Where the witnesses came from, who selected them, nobody in Arizona knows. Nobody knows what happened further than revealed by the report, for it was a secret star-chamber proceeding from first to last. They did call two respectable, well-known men in at Phoenix and gave them a few brief minutes to tell facts which every conclusion of this remarkable report proceeds to deny. The report, which is a public document and subject to criticism here and deserving it everywhere else, reveals this sort of evidence to sustain the deficient census report on which the whole of the antistatehood argument rests:

Q. What is your name, etc.?
A. John Jones.
Q. Were you a census enumerator?
A. Yes.
Q. Did you not take a solemn oath to return a full, fair, and truthful report of the population, etc.?
A. I did.
Q. Did you do it?
A. Yes; to the best of my ability, but——
That will do.

What a probing for the facts! What a vigorous effort to find out whether there were defects in the census! Mind you, the people had nobody to represent them, and in this you see what stuff has been piled into Congress to the injury of the people in the Territories.

Better a thousand times for that committee and for the Territories that they had never come, or had stayed long enough to find out the facts, as becomes fair-minded, just, and impartial investigators. I submit that report to a candid Congress. It is valuable only as revealing its purpose and its animus. The dissent from every conclusion of that report by one of its honored members is significant, and entitles him to the respectful gratitude of the people of Arizona.

For the dignity of Congress and for the respect still held by the people for it and the fairness and sincerity of its action I forbear to speak of that investigation and that report in the language it deserves, but I can not forbear saying that some men from the good old States of Vermont and New Hampshire caught from Indiana's epidemic such genius as to take two weeks to tell what they thought they learned in one day and two nights in a strange land infested by native-born American citizens.

THE MORMON QUESTION AGAIN.

Mr. Chairman, prejudice is an essential quality of an ignorant and narrow mind. As the mind narrows, the prejudice broadens until it includes whole communities, but probably the most despicable manifestation of this mental infirmity is observed where the religions of men are concerned. The less such men know about a creed the more they condemn it. But a mind capable of condemning a whole community or sect is too restricted, narrow, and saturated with prejudice to be intrusted with the responsibility of administering the affairs of government or of sitting in the councils of the wise and prudent.

It is not my purpose here or now to enter into any defense of the Mormon people of Arizona. They need none. More than once I have had occasion on this floor to give my testimony in their defense against the slanders heaped upon them by those who know nothing about them. I am glad here to say again for them that this broad land furnishes no citizens anywhere who excel them in industry, frugality, and strict compliance with every contract.

They are among the pioneers of Western civilization. To them is due the credit of having conquered the desert and established in waste places thriving cities, the morality of which should be an object lesson to their traducers. I have yet to see one of their blatant traducers with whom I would exchange a Mormon boy's promise to pay me a debt for the other's note of hand. It is easy, and sometimes popular, to assail any persecuted class. There has been recently chosen a Senator of the United States from among these people. He is a man of education, ability, honesty, integrity, sobriety, and purity of life, yet we find him assailed from high places, and his people slandered by others who are in no sense his equal.

I am not claiming for the few Mormons in Arizona that they are any better citizens than other honest citizens of our country, but I say what I have said as an answer to those who are claiming that Arizona is not worthy of statehood because some Mormons live there.

The last public assault made on Arizona in respect to this shows to what length our opponents are driven, and the speaker's gratuitous and reckless statements did neither him nor his position any credit. Appealing to a prejudice, he saw fit to largely exaggerate the number of Mormons in Arizona and thus attempt to scare others equally ignorant of the question from support of the statehood bill. I say here once for all that if there were as many Mormons in Arizona as claimed by the opponents of statehood—yes, if there were five times as many as claimed—it would be no argument against our right and their right to every privilege enjoyed by other citizens of the Republic.

Mr. Chairman, our struggle for statehood has been long and arduous. We have had so many slanders to refute, so many misrepresentations to disprove, so many prejudices to overcome, that one grows weary at times and would fall by the wayside for rest were the cause less holy, liberty less prized, or tyranny less hated. The charge of ignorance and illiteracy is as groundless as the balance of the indictment. That there is 29 or even 9 per cent of illiteracy in Arizona among the citizens—excluding the Indians—is simply false. There is no ground for such a statement by anybody anywhere. The first twenty-five years of my life were spent in a community of as highly and as generally educated people as live in America to-day.

The last equal number of years has been spent in Arizona, and I know of as much illiteracy in the famous blue-grass regions of Kentucky as exists among the citizens of Arizona. There are twice as many—yes, probably four times as many—per capita in the State of Minnesota who can not read, write, or speak the English language as are to be found in Arizona, yet that State has Representatives of prominence who make this charge against my constituents. Against such a charge I place my personal experience. In a general practice of law in Arizona for over twenty years, being a part of that time a public prosecutor, I have met but one single man that had to make his mark as a signature to any document. Education is more universal in Arizona than in any Congressional district in the United States, and once for all, I deny the slanderous allegations of illiteracy, come from what source it may.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I can not forbear the expression of my humiliation as I hear from lips of grave legislators arguments against the people I represent here, advanced on grounds so puerile, senseless, and unjust as to do no credit to the orator, but tends to plant a prejudice in similar natures against the good people of the West. High place carries a certain weight, regardless of the motive or force of the argument. Things said in the heat of debate and under impulse of excitement can readily be forgiven by the generous; but there is no excuse for any man to write or have written for him an assault on the virtue and honor and integrity of a people, and like a stumbling schoolboy, drool the slimy slanders over empty chairs to fix them at last in the imperishable records of Congress. Against this I enter my emphatic though unavailing protest.

Eulogy on the Late Hon. J. M. Moody, of North Carolina.

OF

HON. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 22, 1903,

On the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted, the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of the Hon. JAMES MONTRAVILLE MOODY, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of North Carolina.

"Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a faithful and distinguished public servant, the House at the conclusion of the memorial proceedings shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk be, and he is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased."

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Under the order of the House I desire to record a tribute to the memory of the departed friend whom eternity's dreaded deputy has so lately summoned from our midst. Mr. MOODY was a lawyer by profession, as are all the other North Carolina Representatives. He was an earnest, strong advocate, easily comprehending the important facts and presenting them with great clearness and power. He soon became recognized as a splendid jury lawyer. At the age of 28 he was elected solicitor, or prosecuting attorney, as the office is called in some States, of what was then the twelfth judicial district of North Carolina, and served as such for four years. There is, in my judgment, no position in the gift of the people better than a solicitorship for the development of a lawyer's mind and heart, for the growth of his love of justice and humanity, for quickening his understanding and improving his presentation of views. This opportunity was taken by our friend, and his performance of its duties was the basis of his subsequent honors.

In politics he was a staunch, uncompromising Republican and believed in the doctrines and policies of his party. In the most hotly contested campaigns known to our State in this generation, even in those in which his party suffered defeat, his rugged honesty, his never failing loyalty, his undaunted personal courage were sources of strength to his party throughout the mountain section of the State. Notwithstanding his party zeal he had the respect and friendship of political opponents in a very large degree, perhaps more so than any other person in the State of equal activity and prominence in politics.

As a member of this body he was diligent, and to every demand made upon him by his constituents he was attentive—a faithful servant of his people. Probably the most important work he did was in behalf of the Appalachian Park. He knew the country proposed to be embraced in it and understood the entire matter as few members do, and to him was intrusted the duty of preparing the report in its favor. It was near and dear to his heart, and I doubt not that one of the disappointments of his public career came to him when he found that the Appalachian Park bill would not be permitted to have consideration during this Congress. The work he did has not been lost, and we trust the day is not far distant when success will crown the efforts in behalf of that great national forest reserve which he and others began in this Congress.

Mr. MOODY and myself lived at the same hotel, and I learned to know him well. I remember distinctly the last time I saw him. It was in the lobby of our hotel the day before he went home to prematurely lay down life's burden, and was probably the first time he had been out of his room in several weeks. The fatal malady had announced its presence, and yet he was deeply interested in matters pertaining to his people. For him I had that day succeeded in having an item put in the Indian appropriation bill for the relief of some of his constituents, for whom he had introduced a bill. He was highly gratified, and expressed great pleasure over it, as it meant so much to his constituents.

I had heard that his physician had fears for his recovery, and as I looked upon his massive frame I wondered that such fears could be serious, and hoped that his going home to his beautiful mountain country would be followed by a speedy return of his accustomed health. A few days thereafter, on February 5, a telegram brought the sad news that JAMES MONTRAVILLE MOODY was no more. It was not my fortune to accompany the funeral party from this city, the scene of his last activities, to Waynesville, where he died, but my sympathies went to that sorrowing town and to his loved ones bereaved. His wife and children have the consolation that integrity, courage, ability, and honor leave, but above all else they have the hope that he awaits them in "an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." Our friend had considered that all-important question: "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" and had made the preparation of wisdom by accepting the doctrines of Jesus Christ and dedicating himself to His service. When the silver cord is loosed and the golden bowl is broken the belief that our loved one's spirit lives forever where there is no sin is the greatest solace good men and women can have.

When this Congress began, one scanning its membership would never have selected our friend as destined to early death. He was a man of large proportions, about 6 feet tall, and weighed perhaps 225 pounds; broad-shouldered, a giant in physical strength, he seemed in the prime of vigorous manhood. We are reminded that with each day the never-erring archer comes nearer to us, and one by one his shafts shall take our lives. The sands in the hourglass run swiftly and the old must die, but the archer reserves not his arrows for them alone. The fall of friend after friend in age and in youth, in weakness and in strength, speaks to us as of old, "Be ye also ready." Death respects not youth or strength or anything of which mankind boasts. Decay claims all things material. There is a limit for all that can be felt or seen; but to the immaterial there is no decay, no limit, no death. The spiritual lives forever free from the germs of disease, exempt from Time's corrosion. Death itself in the presence of the spiritual is powerless. "Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

The Trust Problem.

OF

HON. ROBERT W. MIERS,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 5, 1903.

The House being in Committee of the Whole and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 17) requiring all corporations engaged in interstate commerce to file returns with the Secretary of the Treasury, disclosing their true financial condition, and of their capital stock, and imposing a tax upon such as have outstanding capital stock unpaid in whole or in part—

Mr. MIERS of Indiana said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The industrial combinations popularly called trusts are a development of recent growth in the business world. They differ entirely from the other time-honored combinations of business men. From time immemorial men have combined in business. They have formed partnerships, companies, associations, etc. In all such cases the combination has been for mutual interest and convenience, and the result has ususally been beneficial to the public. If Smith, Jones, and Robinson found that they had not enough capital or personal strength individually to make a success in business, it was perfectly natural and commendable for them to combine forces. In that way they could succeed, and the public was also a gainer, because there would now be one successful store or factory where there would have been otherwise three unsuccessful ones. If Smith, Jones, and Robinson became so successful as to amount to a monopoly and to tempt them to impose on the public, the inevitable result was that Brown, Williams, and Thompson would form a similar partnership. Their competition would keep the original firm within the bounds of reason and decency, and so the public would be benefited by this competition. The firms would also be benefited, because the low prices caused by their competition would create increasing demand and increasing sales. Thus it became a proverb that "Competition is the life of trade," and never was there a truer saying.

All this healthy, natural, and mutually beneficial state of affairs in our society at large has now "gone glimmering." There is no more competition. Everybody in trade sells the same things at the same prices; and the reason is that the trusts have obtained complete control over the production and sale of almost every article of trade and commerce in ordinary use and demand. The trusts differ from ordinary companies, partnerships, or firms in this important and radical respect—that while ordinary companies or firms are, or used to be, formed for the purpose of competing with other and similar firms in the same line of business, the trusts are formed in order to secure a monopoly of all business in any special line by consolidating all the different companies in that line or crushing the few who perhaps will not consent to be absorbed by the trust, and thus to stifle all competition and absolutely control the prices and the output in that line of production.

This absolute control of the production and prices has been secured in nearly every line of business in this country. The people have absolutely nothing to say about what they shall pay for what they wish to buy. The various competing firms and merchants have been absorbed by the trusts or frozen out of business, and the trusts dictate how much of each kind of commodity shall be produced and placed on the market and what the prices shall be. If you do not like the price, you can go without. There is no use to run around the corner to another store, as you formerly did, to see if you can find a better price there. You can go if you want to, of course, but you will gain nothing by going. You will only find the same goods in all the stores and the same prices. Frequently the managers of the trusts get together to see how business is, and if it is thriving and the goods are in large demand they put on the screws, raise the prices, and keep raising them as long as the public will stand it. The public has no remedy, no recourse. The old remedy of competition is gone. There is no way of competing with the trusts. They control all the raw material, all the mills, all the means of transportation.

Few people have any adequate idea of the tremendous extent to which the trusts have encroached upon the business interests of this and the other nations of the world. The amount of money which they control is positively appalling—almost inconceivable—and, as I have already said, their ramifications have become so extensive that they include and absolutely govern almost all the productive industries of mankind. There are to-day in the United States more than 200—in fact, about 240—actual and genuine trusts, exercising complete or nearly complete monopoly in the same number of lines of business and having absolute control over the production, output, marketing, sales, and price in all these lines of business. These trusts are of very unequal size and importance. Some of them are comparatively small and deal in matters of comparatively small volume, but there are at least 100 that are very large and exercise control over the most important necessaries of life.

In addition to these 240 real trusts and incorporated combinations, there are fully as many more combinations of various sorts which belong in the same category and deserve as much execration. These are such combinations as are generally called "pools," "selling agencies," and all kinds of traffic agreements between railroads, insurance companies, express companies, telephone companies, and other associations having what is called a "community of interest." All pools and cliques of this sort are founded on the same principle as that of the trusts, namely, with the idea of binding together all the different interests of any particular line of business all over the country, or throughout large sections of the country, so as to shut out competition and make the people pay whatever the pool can screw on them. There are also a large number of electric lighting, electric transit, gas, and water companies, scattered all over the country, which exercise an absolute monopoly in their lines in the communities or sections which they cover. Adding together all these different forms of trust and monopolistic combinations, the total number is nearly 500.

I have a list of the trusts, properly so called, but can not recite the entire list on this occasion, as it would take altogether too much time and would prove to be too monotonous. A few of the typical trusts may be cited, however, to give an idea of the whole catalogue.

At the head and front of the list stands the gigantic United States Steel Corporation, commonly called the steel trust, which has absorbed more than 99 per cent of the capital of all the leading steel corporations of the United States, and which is capitalized at the enormous sum of $1,100,000,000, besides bonds to the amount of $300,000,000, making a total capitalization of $1,400,000,000. Have any of you any adequate idea of how much money this is? Have any of you an adequate idea of what it means to control absolutely the steel industry? It means that by banding together all the steel-producing plants in this country the managers of this gigantic trust can and do produce just as much or just as little steel as they choose; can employ just as many workmen as they choose; can keep the mills running night and day or can shut them up for weeks at a time; can pay whatever wages they choose; can put whatever articles they choose on the market and can charge whatever prices they please for them.

The people are compelled to have steel, and they must get it from the trust and pay the trust whatever it demands. If the trust finds that it has produced more goods than it can sell to this country at high prices, it can send the goods to Europe and sell them to European dealers at low prices, thus producing a scarcity here and enabling the trust to keep up the high prices in our home market. Not only can the trust do this, but it has done it and is doing it all the time. By such means as these the steel trust is enabled to pay large dividends to its stockholders and bondholders and princely salaries to its millionaire managers. Its most recent dividends have been 5 per cent on its bonds, 4 per cent on its common stock, and 7 per cent on its preferred stock, amounting in all to about $70,000,000 in dividends alone annually.

I have dwelt at length on this in order to show how these trusts operate. They all work the same way. The great Standard Oil trust, capitalized at $100,000,000, controls the oil market of this country just as the steel trust controls the steel market, and its monopoly has become so perfect that ever since 1900 its dividends have been at the rate of 48 per cent annually; in other words, the Standard Oil magnates are making a clear gain of $48,000,000 every year on an investment of $100,000,000. That is because they have an absolute monopoly of the oil production and business of the United States. If there were competing oil companies, do you suppose those oil kings would make 48 per cent on their investment?

Then there is the American Car and Foundry Company, with a practical monopoly of car manufacture, capitalized at $60,000,000, and paying 7 per cent on its preferred stock; the American Locomotive Company, a $50,000,000 monopoly, also paying 7 per cent; the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, combining over 50 big telephone plants, and capitalized at $130,000,000, paying 9 per cent dividends; the Consolidated Tobacco Company, controlling practically all the tobacco business of the country; the salt trust, which will eventually control the salt industry not only of this country but of the world; and, not to weary you with so many different names, many other trusts absolutely or almost absolutely controlling all manner of goods, products, and commodities—fish, oysters, copper, chemicals, fertilizers, sugar, bicycles, harvesting machines, brass wire, ironware, tinware, lead ware, steel ware, wood ware, cement, linseed oil, canned goods, meat products, coal, ice, leather, felt, paper, thread, glass, woolen goods, matches, electric goods of all kinds, rubber, pottery, machinery of all kinds, kodaks, caramels, chewing gum, baby carriages, coffins—literally everything we eat, drink, wear, or use from the cradle to the grave.

The total capitalization of these 240 trusts reaches a figure which is beyond the power of an ordinary mind to grasp. According to the most careful calculations the sum considerably exceeds $6,000,000,000—to be precise, $6,771,844,150.

If to this we add the capital of the various pools, local electric monopolies, etc., to which I have just referred, we get the astounding total of not less than $10,000,000,000. This almost incredible amount, be it remembered (an amount nearly five times as great as the whole cost of the civil war to the Northern States), is not being used for the benefit or the development of the community at large. If it were, there would be no objection to it. On the contrary, it is being locked up away from the people and devoted exclusively to the development and advantage of about 500 different private enterprises, whose sole end and aim is to obtain a monopoly of all productive and business activity for themselves and against the interest of the people. All this $10,000,000,000 is in the hands of a few thousand men, who are using this immense wealth simply to reduce the public to a condition of commercial slavery and to increase their own already inordinate riches by the process of picking the pockets of the common people.

Some may say that this is an overstatement. Some may say, "It is true, no doubt, that the trusts are tremendously capitalized, that they are managed by a comparatively few people, and that they control the markets, but that in itself does not prove that they injure the people." No; it does not. But the course which prices have taken since the formation of the trusts does prove it.

Before I go into this subject, and before leaving the subject of capitalization, I must by no means forget to remind you that a large part—probably two-thirds—of the capital of the trusts is "water." In almost all of the large trusts practically all of the common stock is "water," and so is a good part of the preferred stock. For example, in the baking-powder trust, capitalized at $20,000,000—$10,000,000 "common" and $10,000,000 "preferred"—it has been ascertained that fully 95 per cent of the stock is "watered," if the cost of the tangible assets only be considered. In the steel trust the bonds alone—$300,000,000—are nearly equal to the original cost of all the constituent properties comprised in the trust; so that practically all the immense amount of common and preferred stock of that overgrown trust—$1,100,000,000—is nothing but "water."

Now, these watered trusts are, in fact, paying their rich dividends on watered stock. The Royal Baking Powder Company, for example, paid 6 per cent, or $600,000, in dividends last year on a stock which, as I have just said, is 95 per cent "water." The steel trust's dividend of about $50,000,000 on common and preferred stock is also practically on "water." In other words, these trusts have "roped in" nearly all the industrial and productive enterprises of the country and have established themselves on a fictitious and inflated basis of capitalization, and are charging the people unnecessarily high prices for all their products, in order that they may take money out of the pockets of every hard-working poor man and woman in this country, so as to pay themselves immense dividends on stock which represents no value whatever, and which cost them nothing, and thus enable themselves to lead lives of idleness, luxury, and self-indulgence at the expense of the general public, and make the working men and women of the United States pay the bills of these selfish millionaires for their champagne, automobiles, country clubs, steam yachts, race horses, diamond tiaras, and coronation knee breeches.

Examination of the list shows that the rate of dividends declared by these trusts is in most cases far above the legal rate of interest on money, far above what an ordinary individual can get by loaning or investing his funds, far above the rate of interest which the laboring people of the country, the wage-earners, can receive for their hard-earned gains. The people of the country must not forget this fact. The savings banks contain deposits and accumulations, mainly of small sums, put there by the working people, their modest little savings, gathered together by the exercise of strict economy and self-denial as the result of infinite toil from morning until night, day by day, week in and week out, for years and years. What do they get for their humble, hard-earned savings? Three and one-half per cent generally, sometimes 4 per cent. And every dollar of their little hoard represents hard, honest labor and the strictest frugality. How is it with these favorites of fortune who are in the trusts? The millions and hundreds of millions of dollars from which they draw their princely dividends represents no labor or toil of theirs. In the first place, much of this immense capital, as I have shown, is only money on paper—"watered stock"—while the rest of it—the real money—has been accumulated mainly by the favoritism, the unjust advantages, lavished upon the beneficiaries of the Republican high protective tariff. In other words, all this money, or most of it, which comprises the working power of these trusts, has been wrung out of the mass of the American people, the hard-working, industrial class, the bone and sinew of the Republic.

Look at a few more of these dividends: Seven per cent to the salt trust; 8 per cent to the Amalgamated Copper Company; 8 per cent and 10 per cent to the Magnus Metal Company; 8 per cent for the Pullman Company; 8 per cent for the Pillsbury-Washburn flour trust; 9 per cent for the sugar trust; 18 per cent for the Susquehanna Iron and Steel Company; 33 per cent for the cement trust, etc. Look, too, at some of the amounts: Between $11,000,000 and $12,000,000 last year for the sugar trust; more than $5,000,000 for the biscuit trust; $5,000,000 for the copper trust; $5,000,000 for the Pullman Palace Car Company; $4,000,000 for the leather trust; $1,500,000 for the paper trust; another $1,500,000 for the match trust; $2,500,000 for the rubber trust, and so on.

Nor do these dividends by any means represent the actual or total profits of these trusts. Nobody knows what the real profits are except the active managers. These managers declare whatever dividends they choose to, but they also set aside large sums out of the profits constantly to such directions as sinking funds or surplus accounts, betterments, enlargements, increasing salaries, creating sinecures for members of their families, etc., adopting these and divers other recourses to conceal their actual profits from the public.

A good deal of difference, is there not, between the lot in life of a trust magnate and an ordinary American wage-earner. They who work in a factory, or on a farm, or in a store, or on a railroad as hard as they can work all the year round for perhaps $1,000 a year at the outside, and able, perhaps, to lay by $100 a year in the savings bank, can go to the bank at the end of the year and draw out the extraordinary sum of $3 or $4, which is paid as a reward for letting the bank have the $100 for a whole year, which money the bank has been loaning to these very trusts for the purpose of oppressing the wage-earner, while pocketing greatly enhanced profits from these industrial combinations. This $3 or $4 is his dividend for the year, and it is not sufficient to warrant him to take a single day off from toil. What is the dividend of the trust magnate? Thousands of dollars every few days or weeks without lifting his hand to do a stroke of work from one year's end to the other, and enabling him and his family to live in luxury and do nothing whatever but drive and sail and dance and eat, drink, and be merry, without the shadow of a care for the morrow.

Understand, I make no complaint against wealth honestly acquired. I do not believe that the hardest working, poorest man in this country has any grudge against the rich man so long as he has won his wealth by honest toil, and so long as he uses it for the benefit of others as well as his own, as every rich man ought to do. But I do complain of these trusts and trust magnates, because they have not won their wealth by honest toil but by governmental favoritism, and because their gains have been extorted by unfair means from the common people of this country.

Returning now to the subject of prices, I will endeavor to show by a few practical illustrations how the trusts control prices, and how they have naturally used their power to advance prices during the past few years. In the first place it must be noticed that it is not absolutely necessary to get control of a line of business in order to control the market. Comparatively few trusts have complete control, like the oil trust and steel trust. If the trust can secure control of over 90 per cent of the output of any product it has at its mercy its small rivals who handle the other 10 per cent. The trust can put its prices down and compel its rivals to do likewise, or it can put its prices up and defy competition for a long time, because the small rivals—even if they give lower prices—can not begin to supply the demand. Then, when the small competitors begin to get orders and do a good business at lower prices, the trust can put its prices way down again and break the small operators. Another favorite way of the trusts is to make one set of prices for one region and another set of prices for another region. Where there are small competitors the trusts can put prices way down for a while and drive the competitors into bankruptcy, and at the same time it can be charging a good stiff high price in other localities where there are no competitors. By these and other means the trusts, if they control nine-tenths of a business, can soon dispose of the remaining tenth at their own sweet will.

It was urged in the early days of the trusts, in their defense, that they were only the logical extension of the principle of partnership—only a larger kind of company or business firm—and that their effect would be beneficial to the public because they would be enabled to prevent overproduction and underproduction and to regulate the output according to the needs of the community, and also practice greater economy in the administration of the business, eliminating superfluous officers, etc., all of which, it was said, would result in diminishing prices of the products and in furnishing more abundant employment at increased wages. I have shown that the former claim is false and will now show how false the latter claim is. As a matter of fact I hardly need do so, for everyone knows that prices are high and wages low, or at least not at all high in comparison with the high prices which the trusts have put on all the necessaries of life.

So far as the question of wages is concerned, the figures of the new United States census, just issued, make short work of it. Nobody will seriously dispute the census, I fancy, especially considering the fact that it has been compiled under Republican officials, who naturally desire to make as good a showing as possible for their party. But the figures of the new census in regard to manufacturing show that the average wages of the laborers in all the manufacturing industries of the country are 6 per cent less now than they were ten years ago. This is the average for all of the States and all of the industries, but in many industries and in many localities the decrease has been much greater than this, amounting in some cases to over 30 per cent. The decline, moreover, has been most marked during the last four or five years; that is to say, since the enactment of the present Dingley high tariff, and during the present and preceding Republican administrations, when the trusts have been multiplying in number and increasing in power as never before. So you see that the trusts have not put wages up, but down. They said they would regulate labor, and so they have; they have told labor when to work and when to stop work; they have told labor what its wages would be and that it might accept or refuse them.

How about prices? What do you think about that? How about the price of meat, for instance? Has the Chicago meat trust diminished the price of a beefsteak lately? Has it put down the price of hams? Everybody knows that the prices of all kinds of meats have gone up within the last year and that we are paying more for meat now than we ever did before in the history of the country, not excepting the period of the civil war. And why? Oh, they say, because cattle and hogs are scarce. What makes them scarce? Have they all starved to death on account of a lack of food, or has there been an epidemic of disease among them? No. They are scarce because the trust which owns or controls all the live stock on the plains wishes them to be scarce and will not permit them to be sent to the market and slaughtered. Why does the trust wish them to be scarce? So that there shall be a scarcity of meat in the butcher shops and so that the trust people can make the public pay fancy prices for meat, and thus put some additional millions into their pockets. That is all there is about it.

But, they say, the Administration is making preparations to prosecute them and bring them to grief. Is it? It is pretending to do so, but at the rate it is proceeding it will evidently be three or four years before any definite results are reached in the prosecution, and by that time the trust will have made hundreds of millions of dollars and can then well afford to back down of its own accord.

Now, take another one of the prime necessaries of life, coal. Coal is fully 25 per cent higher than it was a year ago in most localities. This is due to the arbitrary action of the anthracite coal trust, which absolutely controls the output and price of that article. To be sure, there has been a coal strike, but that has not been the cause of the advance in price. The price went up long before the strike was heard or thought of. The trust has been raising the price again and again ever since last summer. In order to do so it has artificially restricted the production of coal so as to make it appear scarce. But in reality there is no scarcity of coal; there is plenty in the ground, but the managers of the trust have it in their power to say how much coal shall be mined and placed upon the market. They know that the people must have coal to cook their food and to keep themselves from freezing in the winter; and so the managers decided last year, as soon as the trust was well established, to artificially restrict the output and to send prices way up, and thus to skin the public and grind the faces of the poor.

What further need be said about prices? Everything has gone up in price during the last few years, with a very few exceptions. Sugar, they say, is cheap. So it is; but not as cheap as it ought to be. At least 1 cent in the pound goes directly into the pocket of the sugar trust as a clean profit on refined sugar, that being the amount of its protection by the tariff. But all the other articles of food in common use are much higher than they were a year or two ago. Flour is higher, vegetables are higher, fruits are higher, clothing is higher—woolen goods, cotton goods, straw goods, rubber goods, and leather goods. The figures as quoted in the markets prove that clothing prices have gone up on an average of 10 to 15 per cent during the last few years. The most desirable kinds of lumber have advanced 20 or 25 per cent within a year. Writing paper and newspaper stock have advanced 25 per cent or more. All kinds of metal ware have advanced 25 or 50 per cent or more. Tin plate has doubled in price; so has window glass. Borax costs three times what it formerly did. A careful and impartial compilation made last January by Dunn's Review, which is universally conceded to be the best authority on this subject, and which quoted the market prices for no less than 350 different kinds of articles, showed that, taking the average of the prices all through, and with due allowance for the relative importance of the different articles, the cost of living in the last year was 40 per cent greater than in 1897, the year when the Dingley tariff was enacted and when the trusts were fully confirmed in their control of the business of the country.

Now, I think it may be safely stated as a fact that the people of this country have become fully aroused to the great dangers and perils menacing their welfare through the trusts and that there is a general desire to be rid of the trusts. How can this be done? A great many measures have been framed and presented in Congress for curbing and regulating the trusts and making them obey the laws. But the measures that have been passed have proved inefficient. The trusts care little about laws and rules and regulations or courts, juries, and judges, They care nothing even about public opinion. They have money enough to defy the laws, the courts, and public opinion. So long as they are enabled to control the markets, so long will they continue to do so. There is one way in which to deprive them of the control of the markets, and that is to cut off the tariff which keeps foreign competing goods out of our markets except at prices equal to our own artificially high prices.

In order to make this subject still clearer, I have prepared a list of a few specimen articles of common consumption and use, with their present prices in the New York market as compared with their prices in the summer of 1897, when the Dingley tariff was enacted, and also containing the present tariff rates on all these articles.

Oak leather, five years ago 30 cents per pound, now 38 cents per pound, with a tariff of 20 to 30 per cent ad valorem.

Bessemer pig iron, five years ago $10 per ton, now $21.75 per ton, with a tariff of $4 per ton.

Steel rails, five years ago $18 per ton, now $28 per ton, with a tariff amounting to about $8 per ton.

Petroleum, five years ago 6½ cents a gallon, now 8½ cents a gallon, with a tariff of 40 per cent ad valorem.

Granulated sugar, five years ago 4 cents per pound, now 4¼ cents per pound, with a tariff of nearly 2 cents per pound.

Beef, five years ago $10 per barrel, now $16.50 per barrel, with a tariff of 2 cents per pound.

Mess pork, five years ago $9 per barrel, now $18 per barrel, with a tariff of 2 cents per pound.

Also the following wholesale prices:

Wooden pails, five years ago 90 cents per dozen, now $1.05 per dozen, with a tariff of about 25 per cent ad valorem.

Maple chairs, five years ago $5 per dozen, now $6.25 per dozen, with the same tariff.

Doors, five years ago 80 cents, now $1.25, with same tariff.

Common pine boards, five years ago $12 per thousand, now $17 per thousand, with same tariff.

Cement, five years ago 70 cents per barrel, now 80 cents per barrel, with tariff of about 20 per cent ad valorem.

Manila rope, five years ago 5½ cents per pound, now 10 cents per pound, with a tariff of 2 cents per pound.

All of these articles, and the list might be indefinitely extended, we find to be under the control of some trust. Leather is under the leather trust; pig iron and steel rails are under the steel trust; petroleum is under the Standard Oil trust; sugar is under the sugar trust; beef and pork under the meat trust; pails, chairs, doors, and pine boards are under the lumber and furniture trusts; cement is under the cement trust, and rope under the rope trust. All of these articles, and hundreds of others which I have not taken time to enumerate, have been advanced in price by the trusts during the past five years from 15 per cent to 100 per cent. You have not failed to notice, also, that all of these articles are heavily protected by the present tariff.

It is this protection by the tariff which enables the trusts to charge their exorbitant prices and enables the trusts to continue to live. If the tariff on trust-made articles were removed, down would tumble the prices and down would tumble the trusts. Leather, iron, steel, oils, sugar, meat, wood, rope, all these necessaries of life for which the trusts are compelling us to pay 50 and 100 per cent more than we ought to pay could then be bought at the prices which rule in the markets of the world. Then the consumers would be able to get what they need at a fair and proper price, and would not be compelled, as they are now, to pay an additional price simply to still further enrich a few millionaires. That is not too strongly stated. The Republican high protective-tariff scheme pretends to protect American industry, while it really enslaves and impoverishes the industrial workers themselves.

The Republican leaders become very much agitated at such suggestions as these, and say, "If you do away with the tariff on these articles, the mills will all stop, there will be no production, there will be no work, and the country will go to ruin." That this familiar plea is wholly false can be proven in a dozen ways by referring to our past history and experience. But perhaps the best way is furnished by the action of the trusts themselves in regard to the sale of their goods in foreign markets. The trusts produce constantly very large quantities of all kinds of goods, and very often more than are needed by the American consumers. What do they do then? Having produced a supply greater than the home demands, do they throw goods on the home market, and thus enable the purchasers to reap the benefit of an oversupply in lower prices, as it used to happen in the old days in such cases? Not at all. They continue to restrict the supply in the home market, so as to keep up the high prices here, while they send the surplus supply abroad and sell it in foreign markets at the low prices which prevail in these markets, or at even lower prices than prevail there. They would not do this if they could not make some profit out of it. If it did not pay them to send their goods abroad and sell them there at low prices, they would store their goods.

Why would they go to the expense of sending them by freight thousands of miles across the ocean? That the trusts are doing so, and selling their goods in foreign markets at foreign prices while they continue to charge our own people exorbitant prices, is well known. It has been proven repeatedly by the testimony of trust magnates during their examination by Congressional committees, and it has been proven by the printed figures of the export-trade journals and trade lists. Thus it is found that the steel trust is selling steel rails in England at $21 per ton while charging our own people $28 per ton. Our agricultural machines are sold in South America and Mexico for three-quarters of the price that we have to pay for them. Cultivators that are sold to our people for $11 are sold abroad at $8. Our plows that bring here $14 can be bought in Mexico for $12.50. One of our American-made kettles that we pay $1.50 for can be bought in Brazil for 85 cents. Our wringers that are sold here for, say, $40 a dozen sell abroad for $36 per dozen. Sewing machines of the best American make, which cost at home $25 or $30, are shipped and sold abroad for $20. One of our $100 typewriters can be bought abroad at $60. And so on. There is literally no end to the subject, but I must not weary you by dwelling upon it too long.

I have endeavored to confine myself to a logical presentation of what I considered to be beyond all question the most important subject before the American people to-day. It is a question not of men but of principles. It is an issue not of sentiment but of self-preservation. At no time in its history, not in its infancy during the Revolutionary war, not in the throes of the civil war, not in the crisis of the disputed election of 1876, not in any of the financial crises of the past century, has the country been in such danger as it is now. It is in danger of being permanently and irrevocably transformed from a Republic into an oligarchy and plutocracy. I have shown that this is no fanciful danger. The danger is real and imminent. If the trusts are allowed to take deep root, to intrench themselves strongly on the ramparts of protection, they can not be dislodged without some bloody and violent struggle, such as has at times disfigured the annals of Europe. We want no counterpart of the French Revolution in this country. We desire that our reforms and revolutions shall be effected by peaceful and lawful means.

Will we control the trusts? Some say they can not be controlled, but they can. We can raise an army and equip a navy that can cope with the armies and navies of the nations of the world. Ours is the ideal government "of the people, for the people, and by the people," and can control the trusts or any other element that is subject to the people. What party is responsible for controlling the trusts? I assert, without hesitation, that it is the party in power—the Republican party. It has full charge of all branches of the Government—a Republican President, Senate, and House. The committees of the Senate and House are all under Republican control. The Democratic members of the House have introduced more than a dozen bills in the present Congress looking to the control of trusts, all of which have been referred to committees, and no one of which has ever been reported to the House, but lies in some dark pigeonhole of the committee room. There is no way by which the minority can get any of them considered by the House. You have power to smother our bills and to report a rule, which you have done, that prohibits us even the poor privilege of offering in the House an amendment to your bill or to present a motion to recommit with instructions.

How can you say, in the light of the facts, that you are not responsible to the country when you shut off debate and compel us to vote on your bills without the right of amendment or motion? In order to better emphasize your responsibility we vote for your bill just as you present it, although it is not as strong as we want nor what we think the people desire and have a right to expect, in view of the necessities of the country and your platform and campaign pledges. The Republican party as managed and controlled to-day does not intend to materially interfere with the trusts. Trusts have been fostered and built up by legislation enacted by the Republican party. The trusts in turn control Republican nominations and assist the Republican party in times of campaigns. No one knows better than you gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber that it takes more than publicity to affect these great combinations. Publicity is all right as far as it goes.

If you mean to control trusts, why do you not provide for putting all trust-made articles on the free list? Why not prohibit "watered" stock? Why not try an income tax, and the greater the income the larger the tax? Why not make the individual members personally liable for a violation of the laws enacted by Congress? Why not require the stock to be paid in full? Why not stop their business altogether if they violate laws enacted by Congress? Why not prohibit the use of the mail for violation of the laws enacted by Congress? Why not prohibit corporations that violate the laws enacted by Congress the right to engage in foreign commerce and among the several States? Why not show them that Congress is in earnest and means to enact such laws as will compel them to subserve the best interest of the whole country? Do this, and let them know that they must obey the laws as implicitly as the humblest citizen of the Republic, and they will not persist very long. Execute the laws enacted by Congress. We voted $50,000 for the purpose of enforcing these laws against the trusts. You have under your control all the court machinery, including the United States Attorney-General. You have the full power, and the responsibility is with you. Trusts can not be controlled in any such half-hearted way as this bill provides. It can only be done by persistent and firm action by Congress and on the part of State officials. We have corporations more powerful than many of the single States, and they are using this power to control the domestic commerce of the United States. To deal with these great powers is the most important question that has or will come up for legislation. No statistics can measure it, no human intelligence can comprehend it. This subject is as comprehensive as the Republic itself. We who are on the scene of action have a very grave responsibility which we must meet, realizing that we are responsible to the whole country and not to one party alone. [Applause.]

I must speak of one other monopoly that is about to be imposed upon the country by Republican legislation—the enactment of the Fowler currency bill. That bill proposes to use the credit of the nation as a basis for private banking, in such a way as to bestow a monopoly of unbounded resources upon a favored class who have already grown rich by manipulating the currency. The theory of the bill is that "Credit is to money what money is to articles of merchandise." It makes merchandise of money by incorporating a creditor class and by enlarging the resources of that class to the extent of the credit of the United States itself. The guaranty fund proposed is to consist of deposits by the banks, in the Treasury of the United States, "of United States bonds, or gold coin, or both, equal to 5 per cent of the amount of the notes so taken out," thus giving away to these banks as credit to be used by them in their banking operations 95 cents in the dollar of circulation, so that nineteen-twentieths of the capital of these banks will be public credit and one-twentieth private capital.

In this way, we are told, the circulation will be increased by $140,000,000. If this should happen it would be a clear gift of $133,000,000 to the banks. There is no limit fixed for winding up the affairs of these favored banks. The loan of the Government's credit is to constitute a perpetual fund in the hands of the banks and a virtual gift of $133,000,000 to the banks. It is the equivalent to a deposit of so many dollars in gold in these banks never to be withdrawn. The majority of the Committee on Banking and Currency have discovered an appalling situation. The report says:

When we recall the fact that the United States Treasury is bound, from the unfortunate situation in which we have placed ourselves, to furnish gold to all the world free, as it were, because we can not interpose a protest without repudiation, as it might do in the form of an increased rate of interest were it a money lender, every thoughtful man who has grasped the situation must realize that it is indeed appalling and at no distant day will bring its overwhelming disaster.

As a "calamity howl" this surely is not inferior in anguish and intensity to any heretofore credited to the most earnest silverite. Silver has gone out of date and now gold must also go. Credit is now the great thing. "Credit," they say, "is the vital air of the system of modern commerce. Credit has done more a thousand times to enrich nations than all the mines of the world."

Having already monopolized the products of these mines, these bankers are now after a monopoly of this all-powerful credit. They want the Government to allow them to issue notes, without furnishing security, based on the credit of the Government, which notes the people are to be compelled to accept at par. They, in effect, ask the Government to become their partner, and the only responsible partner, furnishing all the credit, and thus establish a gigantic money trust which shall concentrate in the hands of the national banks all power over the currency and the borrowing and lending operations of the country. This great credit monopoly would be a grand thing for the banks, undoubtedly, but where would the common people come in? Wherein would they be benefited? How would it give them any more money or make it any easier for them to obtain money in times of urgency?

Again, the majority report says:

Gold, being the standard of value, may, under given conditions and proper financial influences, adjust itself to the demands of trade if the quantity in use varies but little during the year, as in Great Britain. But gold is too expensive.

Already tiring of the mistress so ardently championed by the advocates of "sound money."

Again:

Our invariable currency panic every fall has long since convinced every candid observer that there is something radically wrong with our practice or scheme, which can not be dignified by calling it a system. The time has come when everyone realizes that the United States Government bonds will no longer furnish a sufficient basis for an adequate supply of currency.

And, strange to say, there is danger ahead.

It appears from the committee's majority report that Secretary Sherman and the other great financiers and bankers who have shaped the currency policy of this Government since 1863 have proven false guides and led us into an ambuscade, where "overwhelming disaster" is imminent. Why should we grant any more favors to this class of financiers who, according to their own confession, have led us to the very brink of ruin? What would Andrew Jackson have done in such a case? In his time it was declared to be a fixed principle of our political institutions to guard against unnecessary accumulations of power over persons or property in any hands, and that no hands were less worthy to be trusted than those of moneyed corporations. The Republican party, following John Sherman, took the opposite view, and by so doing has at length brought the country to what its leaders now characterize as the present "appalling situation."

To extricate ourselves from the frying pan we are invited to jump into the fire. For one, I am opposed to doing so, and believe that I voice the sentiment of nine-tenths of the wage-workers of this country when I say there should be no perpetuity of monopolies.

The banks will get the money more cheaply, but of course they will not reduce the rates of interest and discount charges. Then how does the bill benefit the common people? They have no more money than at first; they have to pay as much for money as before; and there is no more money in the country than before for emergency purposes.

I agree fully with the minority of the committee on this point, when they say in their report:

We are of the opinion that many of the banks, finding their circulation authorized under this bill so much more profitable than the currency authorized under existing laws, will be inclined, as far as possible, to use the currency provided under this bill and refrain from issuing currency under the provisions of existing laws, and seek to force the currency issued under the provisions of this bill to do the business of the country.

There is no doubt about it. Not merely "many of the banks," but practically all of the banks, would do so. This would only be human nature. They could not reasonably be expected to do anything else.

Why should we wish to deceive ourselves or to deceive others? The wage-earners of the country have no part or lot in this bill. The working classes have none. The farmers and small tradesmen of the West have none. The miners and the quarrymen have none. The savings-bank depositors have none. It is opposed to their liberties as well as to their material interest. Its effect would be to build up a permanent moneyed aristocracy at their expense. That, in my opinion, is what its effect is deliberately intended to be by the banking interests which are behind it.

Mr. Chairman, it would naturally and almost certainly result in establishing a plutocracy as permanent, as powerful, and as incorrigible as the feudal nobility of the Middle Ages. We fear the great trusts of the present day, and with reason. We seek for legislation to curb their power, and with reason. We realize how difficult it is to secure adequate legislation to curb even the smallest trust. How, then, can the representatives of the people consent to the formation of a trust by the side of which the steel trust would look insignificant?

If the financial experts in this Congress wish to do something for the relief of the people and for the benefit of the country, let them recall this measure and submit in its stead some patriotic bill whereby the Government can be released from the chains which already bind it to the service of the money kings and whereby the people at large can get their share of the money of the country and reap the legitimate fruits of their toil and enterprise. [Applause.]

The Trusts.

OF

HON. HENRY M. GOLDFOGLE,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 6, 1903.

The House being in Committee of the Whole and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 17) requiring all corporations engaged in interstate commerce to file returns with the Secretary of the Treasury, disclosing their true financial condition, and of their capital stock, and imposing a tax upon such as have outstanding capital stock unpaid in whole or in part—

Mr. GOLDFOGLE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: At last we approach a stage when this House may be enabled to pass upon some legislation touching the great question which for years has been and which particularly now is of the most vital interest to this nation, and which directly affects our citizens in common everywhere throughout the broad domain of the Republic. This question—the antitrust proposition—is the burning question of the hour. It is the one demanding our closest attention. It challenges the best thoughts of this law-creating body.

Regretful as must come the declaration, it is nevertheless true that to-day we are a trust-ridden people. Trade and commerce, those great pillars of a nation's progressiveness and healthful promoters of a nation's greatness, have been dominated over by the trusts, who, as they become greater and larger, and consequently more powerful and influential, fasten themselves, like festering sores, upon the body politic. With an overbearing greed and an avaricious grasp they have stretched out in every direction, strenuously endeavoring to control the various avenues of commerce, and in their operations have cruelly and tyrannically crushed out the average trader and the middleman, and wrung tribute from the pockets of the consumer.

With a selfishness never before beheld in the business world these trusts and combines entered upon the centralization of aggregated and combined capital and corporate power, not for fair rivalry in trade, not for legitimate competition in commerce, but for the absorption of every business interest and the monopolization of every species of commerce.

They have grown and fattened upon a system of undue exactions imposed by them on both trader and consumer, of cunning evasion of laws, of acquirement of special and unequal privileges and franchises, of fraudulent overcapitalization of stock, of improper combinations in restraint of trade, and of crafty devices to monopolize the varied branches of industry into which they extended their operations, enabling them to rule and control markets that ought to be open to free and unrestrained competition, and to raise and lower at will the prices of every commodity in which they dealt, even the very necessities of life.

At a time when the whole country—when the farmer and mechanic, the trader and the artisan, when everyone not engaged in the trusts themselves—are feeling the power and grasp of these gigantic monopolies, we must carefully consider what should, what can, be done to repress the operations of these corporate trusts. It were the grossest folly for anyone to deny the existence of such trusts, yet now and then from the other side of this Chamber comes a faint and feeble denial. With amazement I heard the other day one of the prominent and distinguished Republican members of the House declare on this floor that trusts do not exist. It was the startling denial of a patent fact.

When the learned gentleman from Wisconsin, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. JENKINS], for whose ability I have the highest regard, boldly declared on this floor, and replying to my question reaffirmed, that there are no trusts, I could hardly give my own ears credence. Yet he is not the only one on the other side of this House who in one form or other ventured such denial. All this, sir, to shelter those lordly combines through whose pernicious and iniquitous system competition in trade and production is destroyed, competitors swallowed up, opportunities for employment and business advancement generally are lessened, extortions are practiced, and exactions in every form imposed on rich and poor alike, prices are arbitrarily enhanced, and markets as well as labor controlled, and the industrial lifeblood of the people slowly sapped away. Such, sir, are the trusts of to-day.

Permit me to call the attention of this House to the language of one of New York's great and able jurists, who delivered the opinion of the general term of the supreme court of that State in the celebrated sugar-trust case of The People of New York vs. The North River Sugar Refining Company, 2 Abbott's New Cases. There Mr. Justice Barrett said:

> Any combination the tendency of which is to prevent competition in its broad and general sense, and to control, and thus at will enhance, prices to the detriment of the public, is a legal monopoly. And this rule is applicable to every monopoly, whether the supply be restricted by nature or susceptible of indefinite production. The difficulty of effecting the unlawful purpose may be greater in the one case than in the other, but it is never impossible. Nor need it be permanent or complete. It is enough that it be even temporarily and partially successful. The question in the end is: Does it inevitably tend to public injury?

I might cite a hundred cases from State courts and from opinions of most eminent judges pronouncing such combinations conspiracies against the law, and severely condemning them as opposed to every fair principle of public policy. But I shall for this time content myself with reading from the opinion of one of the most noted and able jurists that ever sat upon the bench of the highest tribunal in the land. Mr. Justice Harlan, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Knight case, 156 U. S., at page 13, said:

> In my judgment the citizens of the several States composing the Union are entitled of right to buy goods in the State where they are manufactured, or in other States, without being confronted with an illegal combination whose business extends throughout the whole country, which by the law everywhere is an enemy to the public interest, and which prevents such buying except at prices arbitrarily fixed by it.

Mark the language of this eminent judge calmly yet forcibly stated—"an enemy to the public interest."

Again, Judge Harlan, in the same case, at page 25, says:

> A general restraint of trade has often resulted from combinations formed for the purpose of controlling prices by destroying the opportunity of buyers and sellers to deal with each other upon the basis of fair, open, free competition. Combinations of this character have frequently been the subject of judicial scrutiny, and have always been condemned as illegal because of their necessary tendency to restrain trade. Such combinations are against common right, and are crimes against the public.

Again mark the language—"crimes against the public."

These trusts have, under Republican rule, been permitted to flourish and grow and fatten until they have assumed a giant's strength and a tyrant's power. Let us, if we have not already done so, provide remedies to correct some of the evils that have been the outgrowth of these monopolies. Let us supply means to reach those things which underlie the structure and creation of these trusts.

Too long, Mr. Chairman, have these combinations upon whom the ban of the Sherman anti-trust law has been placed, gone unmolested, unhampered, and unrestrained. Too long have these corporate combines defied the power of the courts and treated with silent contempt the just demands of a long-suffering and patient people. Entirely too long has there been manifested an utter indifference on the part of a Republican Attorney-General as well as on the part of other Federal officials, charged under the Sherman antitrust law with the enforcement of that statute, to pursue or prosecute those who have been and every day are violating the laws intended to prohibit and restrict illegal combinations and trade conspiracies.

Now, sir, we have upon the statute books a law intended to cover these so-called trusts in a way—and had that law been enforced long ago—had the officers of the Government done their duty under it, perhaps the country would not to-day be so grievously suffering from the operations of the trust. Section 1 of the Sherman-antitrust law reads:

> SECTION 1. Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal.

Yet, sir, these illegal combinations have grown and multiplied in power; yet the beef trust, and the coal trust, and the steel trust, the sugar trust, and the other trusts are left undisturbed to prey upon a community and continue their robberies of the people. Note what section 2 of the same law provides:

> SEC. 2. Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Yet, in the face of the most glaring proofs and notorious fact that such monopolies are daily and hourly, in the very glare of the day, doing business in violation of the law, there have been no prosecutions in the Federal criminal courts under the section of the statute to which I have just referred. Under Republican rule the law has been treated as a dead letter and the trusts have regarded it as a farce.

Mr. Chairman, at times the President of the United States and the Attorney-General, too, have given utterances against the trusts. But has the Attorney-General acted in a way to indicate that his Department is desirous of prosecuting the illegal combinations against which the laws now on the books are directed? Let us judge men by their acts, not their words—by their deeds and their efforts, not by their professions or their promises.

Why has Congress sat by supinely without enacting legislation to curb, control, or regulate the various corporations who combine and conspire to create and carry on the trusts. Why, I ask, has Congress, if indeed the Sherman anti-trust law has been found ineffectual to reach the guilty parties, not enacted laws to reach the corporations whose operations have contributed to aid and abet the trusts.

Why has the American Congress unheeded public demands and failed to legislate so that the light of publicity might be shed upon the workings and transactions of the corporations doing an interstate business, over which, under the Constitution, we may exercise jurisdiction.

Why has Congress—or rather why has the majority on the other side of this House, in control of this body—failed to exert the power which the Constitution under the interstate and foreign commerce provision invests in the Federal legislature to check and curb, if they could not prevent the organization of these combinations so highly detrimental to trade and so destructive to the commercial prosperity of the citizen. Trusts have contributed from their overflowing treasuries to carry elections; they have been heavy contributors to the campaign funds of the Republican party; their magnates and prime movers have been found among the most faithful adherents of the so-called grand old party. No wonder then that there has been this inaction and indifference of which to-day the toiling masses of the country sorely complain.

No one complains, or rather no one should complain, of any fair or legitimate competition in trade. Fair competition promotes a healthful condition of commerce. Legitimate rivalry should be encouraged, for it spurs men on to business activity and helps to upbuild the commercial interests of the country. Honest opposition in trade pursuits makes men keener and brings out the best points of a man's business capacity.

We welcome fair competition, fair rivalry, and honest opposition and legitimate trade contention, for without it this country would not be the great and prosperous nation that it is to-day. We do not decry or condemn the existence of corporations or corporate interests if they be conducted on just and fair and square business lines.

Trade and commerce is the life blood of a nation—the "calm health" without which no people can succeed—but the pursuit of it must be free and unrestrained to the people alike. The opportunity afforded by the law must be equal. No combination of men or capital must be permitted to erect the walls of exclusion around it. The race for success must be an open one, "where each may freely contest for individual supremacy" in every field of industry, and in which the fittest may survive and the best man win. [Applause.]

As far back as the opening of the first session of this Congress the President of the United States in his message called attention to the trust evil. He recommended publicity as one of the remedies. Even to this, during that long session of seven months, and entirely till recently, the ears of Congress were deaf. Yes, sir; seven long months of a session passed, but no antitrust legislation; no legislation for publicity; no legislation against unfair or unjust discrimination of freight rates—none whatever against the allowance of discriminating rebates and concessions.

The lime light of publicity was not even to be let on the transactions of corporations who were reaping millions and earning fabulous dividends through the fraudulent overcapitalization of stock.

When Congress convened last December President Roosevelt again in his message spoke of the necessity for Federal control over corporations doing an interstate-commerce business. I read from the message:

> No more important subject can come before Congress than this of the regulation of interstate business. The country can not afford to sit supine on the plea that under our peculiar system of government we are helpless in the presence of the new conditions and unable to grapple with them or to cut out whatever of evil has arisen in connection with them. The power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce is an absolute and unqualified grant and without limitations other than those prescribed by the Constitution.
> The Congress has constitutional authority to make all laws necessary and proper for executing the power, and I am satisfied that this power has not been exhausted by any legislation now on the statute books. It is evident, therefore, that evils restrictive of commercial freedom and entailing restraint upon national commerce fall within the regulative power of Congress, and that a wise and reasonable law would be a necessary and proper exercise of Congressional authority to the end that such evils be eradicated.

I shall not undertake now to cite many of the authorities of the courts, nor quote from the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, to show that these tribunals have held that the power to regulate such interstate commerce resides in Congress. So that when the President declares that Congress possesses this power he is absolutely correct; and possessing it, sustained by authority of the highest character, we ought to fearlessly proceed to exercise it.

Does the bill now under consideration satisfy the demands which, in fairness and in justice, the people throughout the land are making upon us for the curbing, the control, or regulation of these corporations? Does the bill, or, rather, if it be enacted into law, will it, serve the purposes for which it is claimed it was brought before the House?

Does it affect in any way the existing corporations or trusts? Or, after all, is it not legislation of a vague, weak, unsubstantial, and ineffectual kind, to be passed as a makeshift and blind the people, if possible, into the belief that the pressing demand of the hour has been satisfied. Sir, in many ways this bill now before us is only a makeshift, full of defects, loaded down with provisions easily evaded, and provided with penalties absurdly inadequate.

In many respects the pending bill is harmless, and yet, as an entering wedge for further legislation, it is not altogether desirable by the trusts. If we can have no better law at this session than the one now proposed I shall vote for it, but I do hope that ere it shall be finally voted upon the amendments prepared by the Democratic minority of the committee will be incorporated in the bill.

When the bill was first introduced by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] it bore the title:

> A bill requiring all corporations engaged in interstate commerce to file returns with the Secretary of the Treasury disclosing their true financial condition, and of their capital stock, and imposing a tax upon such as have outstanding capital stock unpaid in whole or in part.

And the very first provision of the bill required that every corporation engaged in interstate commerce shall on or before September 1 of each year file a return, etc.

How has the gentleman reported the bill? How has it undergone a change that the existing trusts may not be injured and the existing corporations into whose methods we have a right to inquire may not be affected? As the bill now comes from the committee, supported and advocated by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] it exempts the corporations now in being—it lets them generously and handsomely alone. One would suppose that the one who "burned the midnight oil" endeavoring to devise the means to "bust up trusts" would not have seen fit to omit the existing corporations—those corporations against whose methods and conduct people, press, and pulpit alike have loudly protested—from being required to at least submit to the publicity which the President himself recommends.

Lame and impotent, indeed, is the measure as it is presented to us now. Year in and year out we have protested against such combinations as the steel trust, the sugar trust, the coal trust, the Standard Oil trust, the tobacco trust, the iron trust, the cotton bagging trust, and a number of others, to which there has been recently added, last but not least, the beef trust; yet the corporations through whose acts these trusts were made possible, through whose acts they were supported and maintained—these existing corporations are to be let generously and handsomely alone. It is preposterous that this bill is not to reach them.

They are not to be required at all to submit to publicity. When the people come to analyze this bill—when they shall find that you have allowed existing corporations to go freed from the provisions you impose upon corporations "to be hereafter organized"—they will soon discover in whose interest this singular omission is made.

Examine the bill and see if the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] is the "trust buster" he has been pictured. No, indeed. There is no "trust busting" in this bill at least. The title of the bill and the original draft covered all—mark you, "all"—corporations engaged in interstate commerce, but now, what wondrous change. What change came over the spirit of the gentleman's dream? Who wrought it? What or whose mind evolved it? Let there be no misunderstanding on this point. Only corporations "hereafter to be organized" are to be subjected to publicity, and this, sir, to my mind not only practically nullifies the recommendations of the President, but places a premium on existing monopolies.

In his message President Roosevelt says:

> Publicity can do no harm to the honest corporation, and we need not be overtender about sparing the dishonest corporation.

In this I and every member on this side of the House share his view. Why, then, are the existing interstate-commerce corporations to be absolved from the requirement placed upon corporations to be hereafter formed. Why, sir, to do this will but strengthen the monopolies already in existence and gain for them an additional advantage over every corporate competitor that is to come. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Let us see how many of the corporations capitalized each at over $10,000,000 were formed within the last three and a half years, and then answer why each of these should be free from the operation of the pending bill, which requires reports to be made by corporations, not in being, but by those to come. The total capital of these corporations—mark you, the corporations with a capital of over ten millions each—foots up to $4,318,005,646. They were formed between January 1, 1899, and September 1, 1902. This is the list, taken from Moody's Manual of Corporation Securities:

Trusts.	Date.	Amount.
Allis-Chalmers Co	1901	$36,250,000
Amalgamated Copper Co	1899	155,000,000
American Agricultural Chemical Co	1899	33,600,000

Even the penalties prescribed by the bill are purposely made light, and in many cases are entirely inadequate to meet the crime. If they are intended at all to prevent the commission of the offenses for which they are to be imposed, the wealthy corporation or the opulent trust may treat them with contempt and smile at them as a farce.

Without calling attention now to many small and inadequate penalties provided for various violations of different sections of the proposed law, I want to call special attention to the absurdly inadequate penalty prescribed in section 5 of the bill. That section as drawn leaves open the door to evasion and subterfuge, but I trust we will perfect it when the time for amendment comes. It provides in substance that there shall not be offered nor accepted any rebate, concession, or facility, etc., whereby property carried by a common carrier, subject to the act, shall be transported at a less rate than that provided in the tariffs published and filed, as provided by the interstate commerce law, but a violation of this section is to be punished only by a fine of not less than $1,000. There is no maximum fine stated in the bill. A fine of $1,000 is practically provided for against the commission of that which is one of the most grievous evils of the trusts—a fine to come out of a treasury of millions upon millions. Observe also that the bill does not impose a punishment upon any officer, or director, or agent of a corporation, who may aid in the violation. The corporation alone is to be subjected to the penalty. Does one believe that such a bill will deter a corporation possessing millions from resorting to violations of its provisions, knowing after a most vigorous prosecution and great expenditures of public money to secure conviction, the corporation may escape at the very worst with what after all to it is but a nominal fine.

When we shall proceed to consider amendments to the bill, let there be no narrow partisanship displayed. I am afraid, however, I am hoping for too much. The party who has stood by and fostered, helped, and sheltered the trusts can hardly be expected at one blow to strike at the institutions who have so greatly and liberally aided them and "soothed and sustained" them in the hour of need.

The people look to this Congress for vigorous legislation against monopolies and trusts. But I say it with regret they will look in vain. Publicity alone, and especially, too, as it is provided for in the present bill, is not enough. It falls frightfully short of the remedy required to meet the existing evil. The Democratic minority have in their report suggested some remedies. They are worthy of and should receive our sober and serious consideration. Pass the bill in its present shape and the people will see through your thin disguise.

You may herald around and about that you will meet the anti-trust question with legislation, but an intelligent people will not permit you longer to hoodwink them. Face the issue, gentlemen, and do not evade it. We are not waging a war on capital. Honest wealth gotten by honest means should never be decried. Capital and labor should go hand in hand together.

But in the administration of this great Government let there be no class created nor permitted through form of law to exist who may, through special privileges and unchecked combinations, secure a monopoly of trade which results in the business ruination of the trader and the robbery of the consumer, for, as a distinguished statesman recently said:

> Whatever crushes out the individual, whatever keeps down the many striving to make a living, striving to make money, striving to accumulate property, tends in the end to the injury of the whole people.

Another great danger threatening the welfare of the public and the well-being of the community is the corrupting influence that these great aggregations of capital are liable to exercise, and too frequently have exercised, in both State and in nation.

Speaking on that subject Mr. Justice Brown, in Pearsall v. Great Northern Railway Company, 161 U. S., 676, utters words of warning to the American people against these dangerous influences, corrupting in their nature, and harmful and baneful wherever they are exercised in legislative or official circles. The learned judge in that case said:

> There are, moreover, thought to be other dangers to the moral sense of the community incident to such aggregation of wealth which, though indirect, are even more insidious in their influence, and such as have awakened feelings of hostility which have not failed to find expression in legislative acts.

When the Joint Traffic Association cases were decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in 166 U. S., 322, Mr. Justice Peckham, delivering the opinion of the Court, pointedly called attention to the unfortunate prevailing conditions and the evil influences of the trusts, when he said:

> It is true the result of trusts or combinations of that nature (railroads) may be different in different kinds of corporations, and yet they all have an essential similarity and have been induced by motives of individual or corporate aggrandizement, as against the public interest. In business or trading combinations they may even temporarily or permanently reduce the price of the article traded in or manufactured, by reducing the expenses inseparable from running of many different companies for the same purpose.
> It takes time to effect a readjustment of industrial life, so that those who are thrown out of their old employment by reason of such changes as we have spoken of may find opportunities for labor in other departments than those to which they have been accustomed. It is a misfortune, but in such cases it seems to be the inevitable accompaniment of change and improvement.
> It is wholly different, however, when such changes are effected by combinations of capital, whose purpose in combining is to control the production or manufacture of any particular article in the market, and by such control dictate the price at which the article shall be sold, the effect being to drive out of business all the small dealers in the commodity and to render the public subject to the decision of the combination as to what price shall be paid for the article. In this light it is not material that the price of an article may be lowered. It is in the power of the combination to raise it, and the result, in any event, is unfortunate for the country, by depriving it of the services of a large number of small, independent dealers, who were familiar with the business and had spent their lives in it, and who supported themselves and their families from the small profits realized therein. * * * Nor is it for the substantial interests of the country that one commodity should be within the power and subject to the will of one powerful combination of capital.

Take away, then, from these monopolies, who have grown up under a vicious system, the extraordinary privileges and special advantages they are now permitted to enjoy and upon which they have thrived; revise the tariff so that these trust magnates may not be enabled to fix and control at their own sweet will the prices on the necessities of life, and arrogantly change at pleasure the prices on articles over the sale or production of which they have secured and exercise an almost exclusive control; prohibit by well-constructed and effective laws the corporations which have been fraudulently capitalized from doing an interstate business; prohibit such combines as the law pronounces illegal from the use of the mails so long as they continue in their violations; prohibit under severe penalties the allowance or acceptance of unequal discrimination of freight rates and rebates by shippers and common carriers who can be subjected to Federal jurisdiction.

Keep under control and governmental supervision the corporations who in their operations deal between the States so that fraudulent practices and illegal combinations may be held in check; in short, pass laws at once wholesome, effective, substantial that will meet the conditions with which we must deal and tend to curb—if we can not destroy—the trusts, and we shall earn the everlasting gratitude of the American people. [Applause.]

In the discussion on this bill I have heard many of the gentlemen on this side of the Chamber eloquently picture the wrongs done by the trusts and their merciless and avaricious grasp for wealth and power. But though they are overdrawn, and rather facetious, the verses I find in a publication just at hand picture well the grasping tendencies of these giant monopolies, who have done so much toward the destruction of industrial freedom.

> Let us corner up the sunbeams
> Lying all around our path;
> Get a trust on wheat and roses;
> Give the poor the thorns and chaff.
> Let us find our chiefest pleasure
> Hoarding bounties of to-day,
> So the poor shall have scant measure
> And two prices have to pay.

Yes, we'll reservoir the rivers;
And we'll levy on the lakes,
And we'll lay a trifling toll tax
On each poor man who partakes.
We will brand his number on him
That he'll carry through his life;
We'll apprentice all his children;
Get a mortgage on his wife.

We will capture e'en the wind god,
And confine him in a cave;
And then, through our patent process,
We the atmosphere will save.
Thus we'll squeeze our little brother
When he tries his lungs to fill,
Put a meter on his windpipe
And present our little bill.

We will syndicate the starlight,
And monopolize the moon,
Claim a royalty on rest days,
A proprietary noon;
For right of way through ocean's spray
We'll charge just what it's worth;
We'll drive our stakes around the lakes—
In fact, we'll own the earth.

[Laughter and applause.]

Sir, the trusts, to which we have referred—those which come under the ban of the Sherman antitrust law—are opposed to the policy, the spirit, and the genius of our American institutions. Break, oh break the shackles and fetters which trade conspiracies and over-avaricious combines would place upon brawn and muscle and brains and genius, and through which they would stifle energy and smother ambition. Rise, ye representatives of a free people, above mere considerations of politics in this all-important matter, to the high, exalted position of true statesmanship with an eye solely and singly for the public weal, so that the individual identity and opportunity of the citizen may be strengthened and preserved, and the good, old, sound Democratic doctrine may be strictly observed throughout the land: "Equal and exact justice to all; special privileges and advantages to none." [Applause.]

Statehood Bill.

OF

HON. STEPHEN B. ELKINS,

OF WEST VIRGINIA,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Monday, February 9, 1903.

The Senate having under consideration the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States—

Mr. ELKINS said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] during his remarks read from a speech I made in the House twenty-seven years ago upon a bill to admit New Mexico as a State in the Union, which bill passed the House by two-thirds majority and passed the Senate by a like vote, but with a slight amendment. It was so late in the session that I was unable to have the bill taken from the desk of the Speaker of the House and the Senate amendment concurred in, and in this way the bill failed though having passed both bodies by such a large majority. I thank the Senator for giving me the opportunity at this time to reply to some criticisms he has made on that speech, as well as set forth briefly some of the reasons that have moved me heartily to support the bill under consideration.

Mr. President, it did seem to me that the question of statehood for the various Territories had been most happily settled by both parties in the national conventions of the two great parties during the last twelve years, and especially in the last conventions which declared in unmistakable terms in favor of the admission of the Territories named in this bill. When I saw that the bill now before the Senate had been reported favorably in the House, and noticed its passage with a unanimity which was almost unparalleled, I felt there could no longer be any doubt in doing a matter of simple justice so long delayed and so long denied to the people of the Territories.

PLEDGES IN NATIONAL PLATFORMS OF BOTH PARTIES.

Mr. President, I think it is well for Senators to recur to the pledges made in the national platforms of both parties on the subject of the admission of the Territories. I know it has been claimed vigorously and eloquently in this debate by Republican Senators that these pledges do not mean anything, and have no binding force or effect on the great political parties making them. I have asked myself while the debate has been in progress if this be the case what were they put in the platforms for if they did not mean anything. and were not to be kept as other pledges and declarations. I must confess, however, that the Democratic party has tried to keep the pledges made in its platforms as to the admission of the Territories, and I am glad when an opportunity presents itself which enables it to be said broadly that the Democratic party is keeping faith and standing by its pledges. In the House I think the Democrats voted unanimously in favor of the bill now under consideration.

But here in this body, where prejudice should be hushed into silence and Senators see their duty with a clear vision, strange to say, a majority of the Republican Senators oppose this measure, while there is practical unanimity among the Democratic Senators in its favor. I regret to see, and regret more to admit, that the Republican party in the Senate in this case is not keeping faith, but seeking by specious argument to evade the obligations laid upon its members in Congress by the declarations of its national platforms.

Mr. President, I will detain the Senate long enough to read these declarations, and I do not see how it is possible for a Republican Senator to avoid or evade them. I go back as far as 1888.

The Republican convention assembled in Chicago in June of that year, on the subject of the admission of South Dakota as a State in the Union, said:

South Dakota should of right be immediately admitted as a State in the Union, under the constitution framed and adopted by her people, and we heartily indorse the action of the Republican Senate in twice passing bills for her admission. The refusal of the Democratic House of Representatives, for partisan purposes, to favorably consider those bills, is a willful violation of the sacred American principle of local self-government, and merits the condemnation of all just men.

This is a severe arraignment of the Democratic party by the Republican party in national convention assembled for doing just what the Republican members of the Senate are doing now in opposing the bill before the Senate.

On the subject of admitting the remaining Territories the convention unanimously spoke as follows:

The Republican party pledges itself to do all in its power to facilitate the admission of the Territories of New Mexico, Wyoming, Idaho, and Arizona to the enjoyment of self-government as States, such of them as are now qualified, as soon as possible, and the others as soon as they may become so.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. ELKINS. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator from West Virginia let me ask him a question?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAY. Is it not true that in the Republican convention which assembled in 1888 to nominate candidates for President and Vice-President, Mr. McKinley was chairman of the committee on platform, and did not Mr. McKinley report a platform containing a provision in favor or the admission of these Territories as States?

Mr. ELKINS. That is my remembrance.

Mr. CLAY. And named them in that platform?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes, sir, and what I have just read is taken from this platform reported by President McKinley.

Mr. CLAY. That is correct.

Mr. ELKINS. There can be no question as to what the language which I have read means. There is no way to avoid it without open defiance of party pledges, which should in my judgment bind every Republican here and elsewhere.

Mr. HALE. Will not the Senator read that declaration again?

Mr. ELKINS. It would take too long. We who favor the bill want a vote on this question and don't want to consume time by reading things twice.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to hear it. I will yield time enough to the Senator to read it.

Mr. ELKINS (reading):

The Republican party pledges itself to do all in its power—

That is going a long way for the Republican party in the way of a pledge—it pledges itself to do all in its power. The Republican party has great power to do things when not hampered by a few members of the Senate—to facilitate the admission of the Territories of New Mexico, Wyoming, Idaho, and Arizona to the enjoyment of self-government as States—such of them as are now qualified as soon as possible, and the others as soon as they may become so.

These Territories were then qualified and they are qualified now for admission.

Mr. HALE. The majority of the committee base their report on that resolution.

Mr. ELKINS. That report is the most unfortunate, illogical, inconsistent, and unjust report that ever crept out of the brains of a committee of this body.

Mr. HALE. It is unfortunate for the Senator.

Mr. ELKINS. Not at all. It is unfortunate for the Republican party, because it not only lays down a rule as to the admission of Territories never heard of before but furnishes reasons why Republican Senators should set aside the pledges of their party.

Mr. HALE. It is based on the proposition of the national convention, that as soon as these Territories are entitled to admission, they shall be admitted; and the majority of the committee has brought in a report that only Oklahoma is entitled to admission. When the others, in the language of the resolution of the national convention, are entitled to admission then we will admit them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let us see what was said later.

Mr. ELKINS. This was in 1888. Let us see what was said later on in Republican national conventions on the subject. Let us see if the Senator's position is true. The platform of the Republican convention of 1892, four years after, declares as follows:

We favor the admission of the remaining Territories at the earliest practicable day, having due regard to the interests of the people of the Territories and of the United States.

Can there be any doubt about this language?

Mr. HALE. That is all right.

Mr. ELKINS. Here is another platform. If it pleases the Senator, I am delighted. I hope it will change his vote and bring him, a most distinguished Senator and life-long Republican, to a realizing sense of justice. Why this opposition, this strangling of justice and continued refusal to assist in the birth of puissant States, as the future will show them to be if this bill becomes a law?

The Republican convention at St. Louis, on June 16, 1896, declared:

We favor the admission of the remaining Territories at the earliest practicable date, having due regard to the interests of the people of the Territories and of the United States.

Mr. KEAN. The Senator from West Virginia certainly does not find any fault with the language he has just read?

Mr. ELKINS. Not a bit. It is right to the point. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEAN. Perhaps if the Senator will read it again——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Senators will please address the Chair.

Mr. KEAN. I ask pardon.

Mr. ELKINS. Here are the expressions of three conventions. The one of 1900 is also here. Now, in 1900 it was declared:

We favor home rule for, and the early admission to statehood of—

What?

of the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, and Oklahoma.

There is no limitation whatever in this declaration; it is plain, clear, and explicit.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me a question?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. What does the Senator understand by "home rule?"

Mr. ELKINS. Home rule for the Territories means, I take it, the appointment to office of residents of the Territories, and in another sense it means State government where people have a right to help make the laws and to say how they shall be taxed, which is home rule in the broadest sense, such as only States can enjoy and Territories do not.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me further?

Mr. ELKINS. Oh, yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to suggest to him that I think he is in error on this point. The phrase "home rule" in the platform there does not refer at all to the admission of Territories as States. It simply means that their offices are to be held by their own people. "Home rule" there means that outsiders from other States shall not be appointed to Territorial offices. That is all it means; and we have lived up to that doctrine.

Mr. ELKINS. Now witness what a fair-minded Senator can say and do when he is so misguided and set in his opposition to doing justice to the people of the Territories.

We favor home rule for—

That is one proposition.

And the early admission to statehood—

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no.

Mr. ELKINS. It is here.

Mr. SPOONER. It is here, too.

Mr. ELKINS. Read it.

Mr. SPOONER (reading):

We favor home rule—

In the Territories——

Mr. ELKINS. What else?

Mr. SPOONER. And the District of Columbia.

Mr. ELKINS. What else?

Mr. SPOONER. "And the early admission to statehood"——

Mr. ELKINS. Why did you rise in your place to try to hide and keep that back. [Laughter.] I am astonished at the Senator from Wisconsin. Early admission to statehood means early admission of these Territories as States, just what is provided for in this bill, and we are trying to do, and a minority of the Senate is opposing.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator certainly would not want the platform of the Republican convention charged with the stupidity of declaring for home rule in a State, would he?

Mr. ELKINS. I think if we had more home rule in the States and a little less rule from Washington in the States we would be better off. That is my view of the situation.

Mr. SPOONER. I am disposed to agree with the Senator somewhat about that. The Democrats——

Mr. ELKINS. I will come to the Democrats if you will let me.

Mr. SPOONER. The Democratic platform was different. It declared for the immediate admission of these Territories and for home rule in Alaska.

Mr. ELKINS. But in this case the Senator will not be bound by the Democratic platform or the platform of his own party.

Mr. SPOONER. I construe the platform to suit my conscience and the evident purpose of the convention.

Mr. ELKINS. Well, a lawyer sometimes adopts strange constructions, even one so able and distinguished as the honorable Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is a lawyer. I admit he is right.

Mr. ELKINS. Strange construction the Senator puts upon plain language.

Mr. President, I am glad the Senator is through. I know what I have cited from the Republican platform is unwelcome reading, and does not sound well to him just at this time.

The Democratic party on this question has a better record than the Republican party; it is trying to keep the pledges made in its platforms. This delights me, for Democrats don't always try to adhere to their platform. Listen to what the Democrats say:

We denounce the failure of the Republican party—

Think of it! The Democratic party being good enough to denounce Republicans—

We denounce the failure of the Republican party to carry out its pledges—

You see how the Democrats construed the Republican platform—

To carry out its pledges to grant statehood to the Territories of Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma.

Here was a great convention, with nine hundred delegates, representing nearly half the people of the Union. See how they construed the Republican platform. They even denounced the Republican party, for its failure to carry out its pledges as to statehood. They believed it meant the admission of those Territories into the Union, and they were right, as the Republican Senators on this floor are right in favoring this bill and trying to keep the faith pledged in our last national platform.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that you can not always rely upon the denunciation of the Democratic platform. The Senator knows perfectly well how they denounced trusts, and yet there is said to be a difference of opinion among them on that question. We can not always be guided by what the Democrats denounce or what they extoll.

Mr. ELKINS. We should allow the Democrats to speak for themselves on the subject of trusts and all other subjects. They are urgent and eloquent on the trust subject—but I know they are right on the statehood question, and finding them right I wish to encourage them in welldoing.

The Democrats declare in their platform:

We promise the people of those Territories immediate statehood.

The Republican party made this same promise, but in the Senate Republican Senators are trying to avoid this promise. There were 900 delegates in the convention fresh from the people and knew their wishes, while there are only 37 Republicans in the Senate undertaking to overrule the unanimous pledge of a national convention. The Republican party made a solemn promise in the presence of this nation and the world that it would give the people of the Territories statehood, and a minority of the Senate is now doing all in its power to evade and set aside this promise.

I now read from the Democratic platform of 1892:

We approve the action of the present House of Representatives in passing bills for the admission into the Union as States of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, and we favor the early admission of all the Territories having necessary population and resources.

Mr. HALE. Always.

Mr. ELKINS. These are pledges. They are not idle words, purely academic, written down for a debating society. They are pledges that are sacred. National conventions interpret the will of the people, and this is the first time in the history of this country that a minority of the Senate has undertaken to set aside the will of the two great parties as set forth in their platforms.

The senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] and the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] and the Senators who have spoken on this subject on the other side of this question say that these promises mean nothing because there was no issue during the campaigns that followed. I believe I do not misrepresent the senior Senator from Ohio, Mr. HANNA, in his powerful, ponderous, passionate, and pathetic appeal to the Senate a few days ago to do its duty, when he stated that these promises did not mean anything because there was no issue. There was no issue and there could be none before the country, for the reason that the Democrats fully agreed with the Republicans on the subject of admitting these Territories. They had, if you please, agreed and declared that the Republican position was right, and made the same pledges and promises to the people of the country that the Republicans had made. What was the necessity for discussing the question when both parties made the same declaration?

When the two great parties agree on any subject, this shows unanimity in the public mind which should be respected by everybody in the Senate and out of it. Because speeches were not made during the campaign in favor of statehood, it does not follow that the words of the platform are meaningless. There could not be an issue, because both parties agreed; and because both parties agreed, this ended the question, and there could be no discussion. There was no difference and no cause for discussion. They agreed in language as strong as could be written. Language means something. It meant something in this case, and can not now be made meaningless because 37 Senators refuse to stand by the platform of the Republican party.

If the Republican party had declared for statehood and the Democratic party had declared against it, then there would have been an issue, which would have been debated all over the country. But there was a unanimity, an agreement, as I have said, on this great subject.

I believe there is a fair majority of Senators who favor this bill. One of the sayings of the older Senators who guide so ably the destinies of the Senate is, "Senators may rely upon it, whenever there is a pronounced majority for any measure in the Senate, no matter how long the discussion, the majority will prevail." I analyze the vote on this bill as follows: I do not know whether it is quite proper to say it, but I believe there are 38 Democrats and 16 Republicans who favor the bill, and 38 Republicans who oppose it. This shows a clear majority in its favor, and also shows those who are trying to keep the pledges of their party, and further that a minority is trying to obstruct the business of the Senate. The will of a majority of the Senate has been fought at every step. An attempt has been made to put the majority of the Senate on this great question in the position of obstructionists, and create the impression that this majority is hindering the business of the Senate. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] says, "We want more deliberation; we want to wait."

Fifty years ago, before the Senator from Indiana was born, the question of the admission of New Mexico was agitated, and twenty-seven years ago, when he was in kilts, and long before the senior Senator from Ohio had reached his dizzy prominence in public affairs that brings me and his admirers all over the country such measureless satisfaction, a bill to admit New Mexico, as I said before, passed both the House and the Senate by a two-thirds majority. Now both Senators plead for more time to look into the question—more time to keep the Territories in vassalage. The Senator from Ohio intimates that his ear is close to the ground, and that he listens and public sentiment is crystallizing against this measure. I wish to tell the Senator that nobody knows better than he that a national convention interprets for Republicans everywhere, in the Senate and out of it, the wishes of the party. It is not what one Senator may think, or another, or even 37 may think—they stand just for 37 individuals in the party. Three Republican national conventions have commanded Republicans in no uncertain words to admit the Territories named in the bill before the Senate, and we are not doing our duty if we refuse. National conventions speak by authority, and their declarations are binding upon the conscience and will of all the members of their respective parties. There should be no public opinion against the pledges of a great party.

Mr. President, no man who has not lived in a Territory can understand how dwarfing are the conditions that obtain. I lived in New Mexico ten years and I know how intolerable are the burdens of a Territorial government. In the great Republic in our scheme of government a Territory is simply a temporary arrangement, a probationary period. The people are only getting ready in Territories to be admitted as States, and for broad American and full-fledged citizenship. It never was contemplated that Territories were to be kept as such fifty or a hundred years before admitting them as States. It never was intended. It never was thought of and advocated until now, in the report of the Committee on Territories on the bill under consideration.

The people of Territories are unfortunate. They have no vote in Congress. They have but a limited voice in the administration of their own affairs. They can not pass laws looking to internal improvements. I have in mind a very important fact which has held back New Mexico; I mean the settlement of Mexican land grants. The United States has been fifty years in settling them. California settled hers, or most of them, in three or four years. Why? She was a State and she had Senators on this floor to push her cause and demand that there should be a settlement of the land grants. I could instance in the Territory of New Mexico and Arizona a dozen cases where, if they had been States, the population would have multiplied. A State government induces stability, inspires confidence, insures home rule, home government, gives power to the people to do things in their own interest through Senators and Representatives, a voice in legislation—in making the laws—that govern them. It brings a better administration of justice. All these things in their fullness are denied the people of a Territory.

Notice the difference between a State and a Territory. The State of Colorado was admitted into the Union with a population much less than that of New Mexico. The State of Colorado and the Territory of New Mexico are equal in natural resources, or very nearly so. Colorado is greater in mining and New Mexico is greater in agriculture and stock growing, as Arizona is greater in agriculture. Colorado, after admission, pushed forward and has become a great and powerful State in the Union, while these two Territories have gone forward at a slow pace.

It is natural for a people to want to be emancipated from tutelage, from vassalage, and enjoy, have, and hold all the privileges and rights of American citizens. Congress taxes the people of the Territories, making a source of revenue out of them, without representation in Congress, without one vote in this body on any question that affects their fortunes, destinies, or dearest interests. Congress can set aside every law the Territories pass. You send foreign rulers to govern them, and they must submit. This is limited despotism. To be in and a part of the American Union is the greatest privilege and boon that can come to the lot of any people.

Mr. President, I wish briefly to call attention to the present condition and history of New Mexico, and what I shall say as to New Mexico largely applies to Arizona, because she was formerly a part of New Mexico. New Mexico has been a Territory for fifty-four or fifty-five years. When General Kearny, commanding the troops of the United States, took possession of that Territory, in order to pacify the people, he said in substance in a public proclamation by authority of our Government: We come here not as conquerors, but as friends. We have raised the flag of the United States over you. It is the symbol of liberty and justice. Be obedient to our laws, be peaceable, be well disposed, and you shall soon enjoy all the rights of American citizens.

That was the first covenant, the first binding agreement between the people of New Mexico and the United States. The people laid down their arms and in due season swore allegiance to the United States, and they have been peaceable, law-abiding, loyal, and good citizens ever since. That was the promise of General Kearny made in 1848 and yet the Senator from Ohio wants a little more deliberation.

New Mexico has applied twenty-one different times to be admitted into the Union and has been virtually admitted twice. Now, let us look at her resources, population, and qualifications to be admitted as a State into the Union.

POPULATION.

According to the testimony of witnesses that appeared before the committee of the Senate the population may be set down now at 300,000.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia if he is willing to take the same kind of admission at the present time.

Mr. ELKINS. No. I said virtually admitted by a vote of two-thirds in each body.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator accept a virtual admission now?

Mr. ELKINS. No; I will not accept it. You have deceived us too long. [Laughter.]

If this report can be relied upon, according to witnesses whom the committee called the Territory has 300,000 inhabitants. It has $300,000,000 of taxable property. It is the greatest sheep-growing State in the Union, having 7,000,000 sheep and 1,000,000 head of cattle. Its coal lands are almost inexhaustible. The area of New Mexico is 122,500 square miles or nearly 80,000,000 acres.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator from West Virginia a question?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. How do you make out that there are 300,000 people in New Mexico when according to the census two years ago there were not more than 195,000, I think, including Indians?

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, let us see how I make that out.

Mr. NELSON. That was two years ago.

Mr. ELKINS. One of the witnesses whom the gentlemen of the committee called—and he is an intelligent and an honorable man of the highest character; a good lawyer; loyal to his people; a Delegate in Congress—testified that New Mexico had 300,000. The governor testifies to it also; and it is a rule that you can not impeach your own witnesses, and do not try it here; you had better accept that: you ought not to try to impeach him anyway——

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator misunderstands. We do not expect him to impeach the witness——

Mr. ELKINS. Not at all. I will not do it, and I won't allow you to do it.

Mr. SPOONER. We impeach your witness, and the census does, too.

Mr. ELKINS. You called these witnesses; they are yours. You put your own witnesses on the stand, and now you seek to discredit them, that you may avoid your duty. That is not permitted in any court. It is one of the first principles of law.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator how a man could testify under oath as to the population of New Mexico?

Mr. ELKINS. Well, he did it, and gave convincing reasons why his testimony was true.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire whether that is not enough to discredit anybody.

Mr. ELKINS. Not at all, a great many witnesses testified. But let me answer seriously. The census showed 195,000, and at the last Congressional election there were 60,000 registered voters. If you allow five persons to each voter that makes 300,000, but Delegate RODEY claims now 375,000 and gives good reasons for what he says.

The Territory has 3,000 miles of railroad; 800 miles were built last year. There are six States in this Union whose Senators are opposing this bill which have not 3,000 miles of railroad. I do not mean to cast any reflections on these States. I have not a word to say against them. But these and some other States have not improved as fast as New Mexico has improved as a Territory. If there is want of progress and development and these States do not go forward in improvement and population as others I am glad they furnish us great statesmen, broad and able men and keep them in the Senate and House and other branches of the public service to the benefit and glory of the great Republic.

According to population, New Mexico has the finest school system in the United States. The Territory spent $2,225,000 last year. The illiteracy of the Territory is sneered at, and it is said that the people do not speak the English language. They are learning it very rapidly. Does the Senator know that in Louisiana for nearly fifty years they had interpreters in the courts, and that the statutes of the State were published in French, and in one house, or in both houses, they conducted the proceedings in the French language?

According to population, there are more public institutions in the Territory of New Mexico than in many of the States in the Union. The senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] has called my attention to the fact that for ten years in his State, after it was a State, the tax lists were published in Spanish.

Speaking the Spanish language should be no bar to doing the people of New Mexico justice, and admitting it as a State. We took these people and were pleased to have them as a part of the United States when all of them spoke the Spanish language—where now only two-fifths of the population speak Spanish. Language does not determine the character, loyalty, and worth of a people, or their qualifications for citizenship—especially those that have been conquered and annexed to our country without their consent.

I have the authority of the Delegate from New Mexico [Mr. RODEY] to state in this connection that New Mexico has 75,000 registered voters. This would make the population 375,000. Last year there were established 100 new post-offices in the Territory.

There are more churches according to population in New Mexico than in any State in the Union. A great many of them are Catholic.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. KEAN. May I ask the Senator from West Virginia whether he makes that statement on the supposed population or on the real population?

Mr. ELKINS. About the churches?

Mr. KEAN. Yes.

Mr. ELKINS. I state that as a fact, and I do not think it can be contradicted. Every village has a church, and what is the best thing about it, everybody goes to church. There are a great many people who oppose the admission of this Territory who do not go to church. [Laughter.]

I state now, Mr. President, after a long residence in that Territory and an intimate knowledge of the facts, that the administration of justice compares favorably with any State or Territory in the Union. Three-fifths of the population are already Americans, coming from all parts of the Union, and many of them were born there. They are as good people as can be found anywhere within the United States. They are an intelligent, law-abiding, religious people. The remaining two-fifths are Mexicans. This shows how rapidly the Territory is becoming American. No race can withstand the Anglo-Saxon. The Latin races and the mixed Latin races give way before it. That was the case in California; it was the case in Colorado, and it is the case in New Mexico.

Of the two-fifths of the Mexican population they were born under our flag, and they are learning to speak the English language rapidly, as testified by the school system which they have established. Nearly one-half of the new counties which are formed and organized are English speaking counties. I will not stop to call them by name.

Now, Mr. President, a word as to the native Mexican citizens of New Mexico, so much misunderstood and about and against whom so much has been said in this debate. I lived for ten years amongst these people, and I take pleasure in bearing testimony to their good character as a people, as neighbors, as friends, as honorable business men, and as industrious and useful citizens of the great Republic. They are a religious and law-abiding people. I cherish for them a deep and abiding friendship; I owe them lasting obligations for favors received and honors conferred upon me when I most needed aid and encouragement, and which I can never forget. I will not desert them now in their supreme effort to emancipate themselves from Territorial bondage and insure for themselves and their children all the rights of full American citizenship, sacredly promised them under the treaty of Guadaloupé-Hidalgo. I would be ungrateful if I did not render them all the aid in my power.

The report of the committee is the strangest in many ways that was ever written or brought into the Senate. I do not want to do injustice to the distinguished Senator who is leading this opposition to the will of the majority of the Senate. He lays down a rule that New Mexico ought to have 1,125,000 people to entitle her to admission, on some theory that we required 60,000 population for admission when we had 4,000,000 people.

Mr. President, suppose we were to adopt the rule, and in the next twenty years or fifty years the United States doubles her population and New Mexico just falls short of doubling hers, then she could not be admitted though she might have more than 2,000,000 population. Then some Senator would rise in his place and declare she did not fall within this strange rule of the Senator from Indiana, and therefore not entitled to admission. A Territory could never be admitted under this rule, this new fangled theory, or notion, never invoked, never thought of or heard of before in the whole history of legislation in this Government. There were no such rules, as I shall show before I get through, ever adopted or hinted at until this effort to deny the people of the Territories justice.

Mr. President, let us look at the population of most of the States when they were admitted into the Union. Then the natural inquiry will be, Why deny to the people of the Territories what we have allowed to others?

New Jersey was an original State, but she had a population of only 184,139. New Mexico has, even according to the census, 195,000. I suppose if this Committee on Territories had been in existence then it would have ruled against that original State and would not have allowed her to become a part of the Union.

Louisiana had 152,923, Indiana had 147,178, and New Hampshire had 141,885. None of them came up to New Mexico.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from West Virginia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. All the States the Senator has mentioned had a population sufficient to entitle them to a Representative in Congress, did they not?

Mr. ELKINS. I will mention some that did not.

Mr. SPOONER. Those which the Senator mentioned had a sufficient population to entitle them to a Representative?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes; I agree with the Senator, but some of the States had not; while Arizona has enough inhabitants now to entitle her to a Representative in Congress, and New Mexico has enough for two Representatives.

Mr. ALDRICH. Together they have.

Mr. ELKINS. I am not talking about the two together.

Missouri had 66,557; Wyoming had 60,705. There are plenty of Senators here in front of me and all around me who voted for Wyoming.

Delaware, when admitted into the Union, had 59,096; Illinois, 55,162; Nevada, 42,491; Tennessee, 35,691; Montana, 132,159; Alabama, 127,901; Nebraska, 122,993. Nebraska is a great State, and all of them are great States. I have nothing against these States, small or large. I am in favor of all the States. Arkansas had 97,574; Maine, 298,335; Vermont, 85,425. Now you are getting down to the ratio of representation. Georgia had 82,548, Mississippi had 75,448, Kentucky 73,677. The number is becoming smaller and smaller. Rhode Island had 68,825 inhabitants; California, 92,597; Colorado, 194,327; Florida, 87,445; Idaho, 84,385; Iowa, 192,214; Kansas, 107,206; Minnesota, 172,023; North Dakota, 182,719; Ohio, 45,365; Oregon, 52,465. This is a long list of States admitted with less population than New Mexico, and why make a new rule now against New Mexico and Arizona?

I am glad Rhode Island is in the Union, although it is not as large as the county in my State in which I live, but it is a tremendous factor in this Senate and Government. I want to say in the presence of the Senate and the country, I do not see how we could get on so well in legislation without Rhode Island. In the affairs of Government she and many of the smaller States exert a mighty and wholesome influence. If the rule contended for by the Committee on Territories set forth in their report were in force, it would exclude at least ten States if they were Territories from admission now and forever.

Mr. President, outside of our treaty obligations, outside of the pledges of our national conventions, outside of our obligation to treat these people fairly and justly and admit them, the simple reading of these facts and figures ought to carry this case.

I have made a comparison showing the increase in population after the admission of many of the States.

New York increased fivefold in eighty years, Pennsylvania increased sixfold in eighty years, Vermont increased 10 per cent in thirty years and 33⅓ per cent in eighty years. Let these Territories be admitted as States, and I am sure, and I am borne out by the facts, the increase will be greater than in any of the States the figures of which I am reading.

Delaware has only doubled its population in fifty years, Maine has a little more than doubled its population in eighty years, Rhode Island has doubled its population in thirty years, Arkansas has increased nearly one hundred times in eighty years, Indiana has only doubled its population in eighty years, Arizona increased thirteenfold in thirty years, and if we make a State out of it it will increase 26 fold in the same period. New Mexico increased its population threefold in a half century.

Mr. President, I will now read what I consider the true doctrine as set forth by a distinguished statesman in the Senate on the subject of the admission of Territories as States. I read from a report of the Committee on Territories, made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] nearly twelve years ago when he was chairman, on the admission of Wyoming as a State. This is wholesome language. In this day and hour of attempted evasion, of finding new rules and how not to live up to our obligations, and how to keep people from their just rights, and to strangle and crucify justice, I wish Senators to listen to this language.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator kindly repeat the figures he named about Maine?

Mr. ELKINS. I will hand them to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. What did the Senator state the figures were?

Mr. ELKINS. I think Maine doubled its population in fifty years.

Mr. LODGE. But when she was admitted?

Mr. ELKINS. Maine had 96,000.

Mr. LODGE. Maine had a population of about 355,000 when she was admitted.

Mr. ELKINS. Maine?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. ELKINS. How has she lost it? I took these figures from data at hand. There may be a mistake. If the Senator shows that I was mistaken, I will agree with him.

Mr. LODGE. I think the Senator will find if he looks——

Mr. ELKINS. On the assurance of the Senator, who is generally so accurate, I will make the change in the figures, but on reflection I think the population was a little less than 300,000.

Mr. LODGE. Maine was set off from Massachusetts, and the Senator knows——

Mr. ELKINS. I am glad it was set off and made a State so that her people could better their condition by managing their own affairs in their own way.

Mr. President, I was about reading the report made by the Senator from Connecticut when I was interrupted.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Territories, submitted a report, from which I read the following:

The Territorial system was adopted only as a matter of necessity, in order that there might be some government in an undeveloped and sparsely settled region. And whenever settlement and development make it possible for a people to sustain a State government, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, the Territorial government should be abandoned and the privileges of State citizenship conferred upon its people. (From Senate Report No. 115, Fifty-first Congress, first session—to accompany S. 894, "A bill to provide for the admission of the State of Wyoming into the Union, and for other purposes.")

Tried by this rule—tried by any rule—these Territories should be admitted. The committee said again:

The committee is of the opinion that, with the stable and settled government which statehood will insure, the increase in population and development will equal that of Colorado and other Western States.

Wyoming had a very small population when that language was used. But listen to the Senator further. I like to dwell upon his language because it is statesmanlike and what we have been accustomed to in the past, and not like the report brought in here by a majority of the Committee on Territories, which is so new, so strange, and such a radical departure from practice and methods of the Government heretofore.

Kansas, Nebraska, and Colorado each with less than 100,000 people. Dakota will probably have 750,000 by the time her people get into the Union. There have been but few mistakes made in the admission of new States before they were qualified.

Then the committee quotes approvingly from Mr. Carey, then a Delegate and afterwards a Senator of the United States, which I will detain the Senate long enough to read in part:

This idea of equality of representation does not amount to very much under this Government. It is largely a theory. Representation has never been equal in actual operation. Nebraska, with her 1,250,000 people, has but three members of Congress. Mr. Dorsey represents no less than 78,000 voters. Mr. Perkins of Kansas nearly as many. Judge Symes's State (Colorado) may have gotten in a little while before she was entitled to admission, but that State cast nearly 92,000 votes at the last election. The young States, as a rule, are the ones that have suffered from the want of equal representation, and not the old States. Of all the legislative States there has been but one admitted too soon.

Mr. President, I quote from another distinguished statesman, Gen. Benjamin Harrison, then Senator from Indiana, who afterwards became President of the United States and left one of the greatest names in our history. He interprets what is our duty and lays down the rule as to the admission of Territories, going back to the ordinance of 1787, the provisions and effect of which have been so eloquently and ably discussed in the speech made in this debate by the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], not answered yet by any Senator opposing this bill.

I read from Senate Report No. 15, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.

Senator Harrison, from the Committee on Territories, said:

The policy of the United States from the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and even before, has been to encourage the settlement of the public lands lying outside the boundaries of the States, and to organize the communities thus formed into States as soon as the requisite population was found within a suitable area. Territorial governments were always regarded as formative and temporary, to be superseded by State governments as soon as the necessary conditions existed. The vast domain acquired by cession from Virginia, by the treaty with Louisiana, and by conquest from Mexico has been carved into States, which have been admitted to the Union as fast as sufficient population was found therein. (Report to accompany S. 967, "A Bill providing for the admission of the State of Dakota into the Union and for the organization of the Territory of North Dakota.")

This is the rule that has been followed as to the admission of States from the beginning of the Government.

Again, General Harrison said:

We do not mean, however, to question the power of Congress in this respect. The power to expand the United States by the admission of new States is plainly given; and in the construction of this power by all the departments of the Government it has been held to authorize the acquisition of territory, not fit for admission at the time, but to be admitted as soon as its population and situation entitle it to admission.

Further on he said:

The ordinance of 1787 was a wise and beneficent compact. It guaranteed certain rights to the people who should settle the Western wilderness, and among the most valuable of these was the right to form a State government and to be admitted on terms of equality to the Union of the States. The hardy men and women who pushed back our frontier and developed the vast resources of the West were to be also builders of States. We do not stop to discuss at any length the question whether one of these States, contemplated by the ordinance of 1787, could become de jure de facto a State without the sanction of Congress. The existence of a State is a political fact and involves the admission of its Senators and Representatives to the Congress of the United States. Again, by the terms of compact the right of admission as a State was upon the condition that "The constitution and government so to be formed shall be republican, and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles." Congress must judge whether these conditions have been complied with.

He said that these questions were within the discretion of Congress, but like every discretion exercised by any tribunal or body having power, administrative or judicial, the discretion must be exercised soundly, wisely, and reasonably.

He adds:

We have no doubt that there are other questions involved in the admission of a State which must be submitted to the enlightened and unbiased judgment of Congress. Some of these will be considered in another part of this report. But the judgment and discretion of Congress must be a fair and impartial judgment and a wise discretion, having reference only to the public welfare and to the right of the people of these new communities to a full participation in the privileges of citizenship.

Mr. President, in setting forth the rule as to the admission of States I know I have gone over ground treated much more ably by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]. I can add nothing to what this distinguished Senator has said in this debate.

TREATY OBLIGATIONS.

Mr. President, apart from all these reasons, which should be ample and sufficient for the immediate admission of the Territories, I hold that there is another reason, and an unanswerable one, stronger than all others. It is the obligation laid upon the United States by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, proclaimed July 4, 1848, under which New Mexico, Arizona, and other territory was acquired, set forth in the ninth article. I wish the serious attention of Senators to this article of the treaty, because I believe that this Government has violated it in so long denying to the Mexicans in New Mexico and Arizona statehood.

ARTICLE IX.—The Mexicans who, in the territories aforesaid, shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican Republic——

That is, who shall become citizens of the United States? The Mexicans who shall elect to become citizens of the United States, as they were invited to do by General Kearny and by this treaty—conformably with what is stipulated in the preceding article, shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and be admitted at the proper time (to be judged of by the Congress of the United States) to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States, according to the principles of the Constitution—

Mr. SPOONER rose.

Mr. ELKINS. The limitation there as to time is left to Congress. I will hear the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator did not read the last part of that with sufficient emphasis, I thought.

Mr. ELKINS. I will read it with more emphasis—to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States, according to the principles of the Constitution, and in the mean time shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, and secured in the free exercise of their religion without restriction.

Mr. President, this was a promise—it was a pledge, made by one Republic to another, affecting the rights of individuals. To whom was it made? It was made to the Mexicans then living in New Mexico who elected to become American citizens. The promise is definite and explicit in terms. Both this Government and the Republic of Mexico said to these Mexicans, "those of you who become citizens of the United States and remain in this Territory shall be admitted into the Union." When? At the time to be judged by Congress. Now, if Congress waits until these Mexicans die, and nearly all of them have passed away, has the United States kept its pledge? It is true Congress is to be the judge of the time, but if Congress waits until these Mexicans all die, then it can't keep the treaty obligations. The full meaning and intent of the treaty-making powers was that Congress should admit these very people into the Union, and it has refused to do it and continues to violate the promise even to their children and the Americans who have gone into the Territory. Congress should have exercised its discretion long ago. The leading statesmen of Mexico have always felt that the United States has failed to carry out the obligations of the treaty in regard to admitting these people into the Union as a State.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question? I understand the Senator's argument to be that that was a promise to the men then living, and therefore if we do not admit the Territory as a State until all the men then living are dead we violate the promise. Now, if that be a sound argument, was it not just as much a violation of the promise to permit one of them to die before we admitted the Territory?

Mr. ELKINS. No, Mr. President, it is not. Nations do not act in that way. That is a very narrow view to take of this great question and treaty obligation, with all due respect to the Senator from Massachusetts.

The Republic of Mexico has been sensitive regarding this matter for fifty years. There were nearly 100,000 people in New Mexico at that time. They were told to be loyal; they were asked to transfer their allegiance from Mexico to this country; they were urged to peaceably come under the flag of the United States, and, as an inducement, these people—religious, church-going, law-abiding, and loyal people—were promised statehood. They believed in this promise, it was an inducement, and they believed it would be kept and very soon they would become in truth and in fact part of the great Republic, with all the rights of American citizens.

And to-day the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] want more time to deliberate, and think they hear the distant rumblings of opposition to the admission of these Territories.

Mr. President, I think that longer delay is unnecessary. I think that the promise made to these people should be kept; and I am sorry to say I do not think it has been kept by my Government. When these people came to us they had to give up their native country, its institutions and associations; they had to divorce themselves from everything that was near and dear to them; they had to learn another language and associate with another people, but they were pleased with the idea of liberty and becoming a State in the American Union, and this was their compensation for so radical a change; but they went to their graves with this promise unkept, and their children, and those who have survived, continue in a state of Territorial bondage, enjoying now none of the substantial benefits of American citizens.

Let me tell the Senate that when the Union was in peril, although New Mexico is situated far south and was surrounded by the Southern Confederacy, yet three regiments came forth from her hills and valleys to defend the Union and risked their lives to save it. They were good enough citizens to fight for the Union but not good enough to be admitted into the Union. When the Spanish war came on they went out to battle under the gallant lead of the present President of the United States against their own kith and kin; and now, forsooth, these people are told that because they can not speak English and for other unfounded reasons they must wait. If this effort to admit New Mexico and Arizona into the Union should fail, I shall despair of the United States keeping its promise.

Mr. President, I have thus briefly, but imperfectly, I know, tried to set forth the case of the people of New Mexico on the question of admission as a State into the Union. I feel I have not done the subject justice. One reason, I have not had the time; but my heart is in the cause, and my sympathy is with the people of New Mexico in their effort to obtain justice so long delayed. As I understand the situation, having lived in New Mexico for a long time, I believe I am more competent to judge of the true status of affairs there and the character of the people and their fitness for statehood than is a committee of the Senate that flitted through the Territory in a palace car, looking from its windows, and who spent perhaps only three days there in calling a few witnesses, and then come to the Senate with a report which I think does these people injustice.

Take the Delegate in Congress, take the governor, the business men of New Mexico, take their leading men, lawyers, editors, and clergymen, all favor admission, and their judgment should have great weight Nothing can be truthfully said to the detriment of the people of the Territory.

To delay the admission of New Mexico until the Mexicans and their children die, and the entire population becomes American, it seems to me, would be the rankest injustice.

The bill before the Senate should pass. Reason and justice demand it, the people of New Mexico desire it, the House passed it unanimously, and a majority of the Senate stands ready to vote for it.

The Philippine Coinage Bill.

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. JONES,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, January 21, 1903.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 15520) to establish a standard of value and to provide a coinage system in the Philippine Islands—

Mr. JONES of Virginia said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The bill now under consideration is radically and fundamentally different from that which is to be offered as a substitute by the minority of the Committee on Insular Affairs. This bill declares that the gold dollar of the United States shall be the standard unit of value in the Philippine Islands, and it also provides for the coinage, under the authority of the Philippine government, of a coin to be known as the Philippine peso, which is to contain 416 grains of silver. It also provides that these silver pesos shall be exchangeable for a gold dollar at the rate of two pesos for one dollar. The lawful money of the Philippines is to consist of the gold coins of the United States, these silver pesos, and the subsidiary silver provided for in the act of July 1, 1902.

The radical difference, therefore, between this bill and that to be offered by the minority is that the minority bill provides that the lawful money of the United States shall be the lawful money of the Philippine Islands. It will be observed that the committee bill declares that the only United States money that shall be lawful money in the Philippine Islands is our gold coin. If this bill is enacted into law, the money of the Philippines will be the gold coin of the United States, the silver pesos coined thereunder, and the subsidiary silver coins provided for in the act of Congress of the 1st of July, 1902. This bill places no limitation upon the amount of the silver pesos which the Philippine government may coin, and I also call attention to the fact that the government is given unrestricted authority to purchase the silver bullion out of which these pesos are to be coined in unlimited quantities. It may be purchased in any of the silver markets of the world. The Philippine government may, under the terms and provisions of this elastic measure, coin either 1,000,000, 100,000,000, or even 500,000,000 of these silver pesos.

In other words, this is an unlimited silver-coinage measure. If it does not provide for the free coinage of silver in the Philippines, it does provide for a silver coinage the amount of which is only limited by the discretion of the Philippine government. The Mexican and Spanish pesos which now constitute the lawful money of the islands are to be retired, and yet no provision is anywhere made in this bill for their recoinage or other disposition. The silver which they contain is not to be utilized in any way. In other words, Mr. Chairman, this bill provides that two Philippine pesos, containing 832 grains of silver, nine-tenths fine, shall be exchangeable for and equal to one United States gold dollar. The monetary ratio between gold and silver is to be practically 32 to 1, although the commercial ratio is even greater, so that these silver pesos, two of which are not intrinsically equal to an American gold dollar, will be to a certain extent at least token or fiat money.

I have heard but three reasons advanced for this extraordinary, anomalous, and unprecedented legislation. One is that the units of value in the Philippine Islands ought to be smaller than those in the United States, since the transactions in those islands are upon a smaller scale than they are in the United States; that labor and commodities are cheaper there than in the United States.

Another is that if the United States coinage system were extended to the Philippine Islands the inducement to counterfeit the American silver dollar would be very great; that inasmuch as these pesos, or 50-cent dollars, are to contain even more silver than the United States 100-cent dollar contains, the inducement to the counterfeiters of the Orient to counterfeit them would be less than it would be to counterfeit the lighter coins of the United States.

The third and last argument which I have heard advanced in favor of this silver peso is that the money of the United States would not remain in the islands if it went there; that it is absolutely necessary to have a distinctive Philippine currency in order to keep it in the islands.

Mr. Chairman, I think it will not prove a difficult task to answer these propositions.

The first argument reduced to its last analysis is simply this: That there are certain interests in the United States behind this measure which do not, for reasons of their own, desire to see the price of labor enhanced in the Philippine Islands. You will observe that this Philippine peso is to contain exactly the amount of silver that is contained in the Mexican and Spanish peso now in use; that it is to be of exactly the same size and shape, so that the ignorant Filipino, accustomed to Spanish and Mexican pesos, and representing dollars, will, it is hoped and believed, not be able to distinguish between the pesos they have been accustomed to and these new pesos, which are designed to take their place, but which in reality are only worth 50 cents. To them all pesos, it is believed, if of the same weight, shape, and size, will be received without discrimination, even though one of one kind may be exchangeable at a bank for two of the other kind.

The advocates of this system put it this way: They say that if we should extend the monetary system of the United States to the Philippine Islands it would suddenly enhance the price of labor to double what it had theretofore been; that if we send there a United States silver dollar containing practically the amount of silver in the pesos in circulation there, a little less rather than more, but which is worth 100 cents everywhere, the Filipino laborer will not be willing to give in exchange for it double the amount of labor which he has been accustomed to give for a Mexican or a Spanish peso, and that therefore they would be obliged to pay twice as much for their labor as they are now paying, which, they affirm, would demoralize and upset the labor market in those islands. But, state it as they may, the purpose of those who are behind this proposition must be apparent to every intelligent and well-informed mind. It is to prevent any rise in the price of labor incident to a change in the monetary system. The introduction of American money would, it is thought, double the daily wage of the laborer. The laborer who now receives the munificent sum of 10 cents a day would, if paid in American silver, they fear, receive 20 cents.

It will be recalled by members of this House that it has not been long since the Congress of the United States extended its monetary system to the island of Porto Rico, and it will also be recalled by those of you who gave attention to the discussion which took place at that time that the very objection now urged to the extension of the American currency to the Philippine Islands was urged to its extention to the island of Porto Rico. It was then contended that it would enhance the price of labor and thus greatly disturb business conditions in that island. Gentlemen appeared then before the Insular Committee and urged precisely the same objection to the extension of American money to the island of Porto Rico that they are now urging to the extention of the American system to the Philippine Islands. And yet that bill was enacted into law, and the predictions then so freely made have never been realized. But, Mr. Chairman, for one I should not greatly object to an increase in the rate of the wages now paid the poor Filipino laborer.

I think that if it were not for the fact that certain gentlemen in the United States are anxious for this particular legislation, anxious for it for the reasons I have assigned, we would never have heard of this remarkable measure in this House. So far as I have been able to discover, there is no precedent to be found for it in the legislation of any civilized country on the globe, unless it be found in the new system recently adopted in the Kingdom of Siam, and which, I believe, went into effect on the 1st day of January last. The British system in vogue in India is different in material respects.

There is not much, I think, in the counterfeiting argument. There are just as skillful counterfeiters in the United States as can be found in the Orient, and the inducement to counterfeit American silver coins, if carried to the Philippines, would be no greater than is the case now in the United States.

Those who think our silver coinage would not remain in the Philippines, and for that reason oppose its introduction there, are the advocates of a cheap or inferior silver coinage for those islands, a coinage the parity of which with gold would, on account of its inferiority, be the more difficult to maintain.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, who has just addressed the committee, has presented, so far as I can discover, but one argument in favor of this measure. He tells us that Governor Taft, who, he says, is universally recognized as the best informed person as to conditions in the Philippine Islands; that Mr. Peabody, who, he also tells us, is a very important man, and the head of one of the greatest mercantile concerns in the United States; and that Mr. Conant, a member of a trust company in the State of New York, I believe, and who he declares is universally recognized as one of the ablest financiers in the world, have all advised this legislation. Whenever the gentleman is questioned as to the necessity for and the propriety of this proposed legislation, we are told that Governor Taft and Messrs. Peabody and Conant approve it.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that if we have only to ascertain the wishes of Governor Taft before we set about legislating for the Philippine Islands, we have wasted much valuable time with the public hearings which for weeks have occupied the Committee on Insular Affairs, and that instead of attempting to inform ourselves as to the needs of the islands and the peculiar conditions existing there in order that we may legislate intelligently for them, we should simply confer the power and authority to close upon the Philippine government and make Messrs. Peabody and Conant its legal and financial advisers. If we are not to exercise our own judgments, but must follow blindly the advice of others, whether it meets our approval or not, then let us confer absolute legislative power upon Governor Taft and his associates and put an end to this farce.

Mr. Chairman, I freely admit that Governor Taft is a gentleman of unusual ability; I concede that he feels the deepest interest in the welfare of the Philippine people; I believe him to be a gentleman of high character and of unquestioned integrity; but I am not willing, even conceding this much, to say that it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to abdicate its powers and functions in his favor and to confer upon him the authority and duty of providing a coinage system for the Philippine Islands. No money other than that specified in this bill is to be legal tender in the islands. The gold coins of the United States alone of all our money is to be legal tender in the Philippines. Neither the gold certificates, the United States notes, nor the silver dollars of the United States are to be receivable in the payment of public and private debts there.

So that a citizen of the United States going to the Philippine Islands and taking with him only lawful money of the United States would find himself, when he reached there, although upon territory belonging to the United States, and part thereof, with money which was not legal tender there and with which he could not discharge any obligation, public or private, should it be refused. To state a proposition so remarkable and anomalous as this, is to domonstrate its absurdity. We are asked to discriminate against our own money in our own territory.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that the distinguished gentleman who has just addressed the House would say in reply to this that it would be easy to take the United States money to a bank and there convert it into or exchange it for Philippine currency. But the same might be said with equal truth of the currency of Great Britain, France, or Germany, or of that of any other great nation.

The gentleman from Wisconsin said, in reply to a question from me as to whether or not his system was to be the permanent system of the Philippines, that in his opinion it would be there for a long time to come. I called his attention then to a question which he propounded on the 14th of January, 1902, to Mr. Conant—a question carrying with it the suggestion that this was only intended as a temporary measure—and Mr. Conant's reply that the measure was merely to be such.

Mr. HILL. To be substituted afterwards by American money.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. To be substituted after a while by the American currency, which the minority of the committee contend should go there now.

I now call the gentleman's attention to the testimony of Mr. Peabody upon this subject. He will not question the testimony of this witness, I am sure—a witness so highly commended by him and one whose testimony he has so often quoted from. Mr. Peabody expressly said that his purpose in advocating this bill was to provide a permanent currency for the Philippine Islands. The gentleman is not sufficiently frank and candid to tell the House what may be his opinion as to this.

Mr. Chairman, the proposition of the minority has this additional advantage.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I heard the gentleman remark that I was not sufficiently candid in telling what length of time the system would remain in the islands. I said, in my opinion, it would remain there for many years. Of course I was not prepared to say that it was permanent.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The gentleman knows that in response to a question from him, or some other minority member, I think it was the gentleman from Wisconsin, that Mr. Peabody, whose opinion he seems to rely upon, stated that it was his understanding that the system here provided for was to be the permanent system of the island. Conant says one thing and Peabody another, and the gentleman from Wisconsin is noncommittal on this point.

I was about to say when interrupted that another advantage to be derived from the extension of the American system to these islands at this time is that if we intend to retain them permanently, our system already being there, we shall not have to supplant any other and different system. We will not have to adjust differences between creditor and the debtor and to redeem at great loss to the United States the supplanted currency. If, on the other hand, the policy which the Democratic party has always advocated shall in the end prevail and we shall withdraw from the Philippines, no complications can arise from our having introduced there the lawful money of the United States. It could make no difference to us whether it remained there or whether it came back along with our sovereignty; so that no matter whether we hold the islands permanently or temporarily, the proposition emanating from the minority offers the best, the simplest, and the most feasible solution of this proposition.

The chairman of the committee said, and I think he did not sufficiently consider his statement when he made it, that the minority had not only presented their measure subsequent to the reporting of his bill, but that the minority actually had nothing before the committee when the report was ordered. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that the bill which the minority will offer as a substitute for the committee measure was not introduced into the House until after the report had been made by the committee. It is also true, and I think I may be permitted to make the statement, in view of what the gentleman has already said, that many of the meetings of the committee held prior to the making of this report were executive sessions where there were present only Republican members. The meeting at which the bill was reported was, of course, a meeting of the full committee.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Wait a minute. On that day a member of the minority, my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON], distinctly stated that the minority proposed to extend the American coinage system to the Philippines, and I gave notice that it was the intention of the minority to formulate and present their views in writing.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I do.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Do I understand the gentleman to say that most of the meetings held on this bill were by the majority members?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The gentleman, if he understood me correctly, understood me to say that many of the meetings held just prior to that at which the bill was reported were meetings of the Republican members. The very day before the bill was reported I went to the committee room myself and was informed by the doorkeeper that the Republican members were in executive session. I know that many of the early meetings were open meetings. All the meetings, I presume, where there were hearings were open meetings.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit me to tell him what the fact is? I have just consulted the secretary, and he says that we had only one meeting of the Republican members. Every other meeting was called of all the members, including the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I accept the gentleman's statement. I understood there were more, but however that may be, the one executive meeting was the important meeting. That was the meeting at which the bill was formally agreed upon. That was the meeting at which it was ordered to be reported, and when the Democratic members were called in we were confronted with this bill as the perfected measure, and not having, for want of opportunity, prepared and formulated our views, we could only announce it as our opinion that the coinage system of the United States should be extended to the Philippine Islands, and give notice to the majority that later on our views would be reduced to writing and presented in the House.

Mr. McDERMOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. McDERMOTT. The bill now before the House provides for the demonetization of what is known as the Mexican dollar, which was sent to the Philippine Islands as a matter of bullion export?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. And the Spanish peso also.

Mr. McDERMOTT. It provides for the demonetization of those two coins so far as the Federal Government is concerned on the 1st of next December, and so far as private contracts are concerned on the 1st of June, if I recollect right. What is to be done with that Mexican money?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. So far as I can discover, there is absolutely no provision in regard to it in the majority bill. The Philippine government is not authorized to recoin it. It may, I suppose, pile it up in the vaults of its treasury. Perhaps it might be sold as old junk.

Mr. McDERMOTT. Then, under this bill you would have this anomaly; you would subtract the token value from this coin so far as private debts are concerned, and yet continue the token value for six months for the payment of duties; and then you would leave it in the islands to be regulated at its bullion value; and it would necessarily pass among the people at its token value until they had been educated to the fact that that token value had been extracted.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. In the meantime the people who had gone out there to exploit the islands, and who desired to employ the natives, would be paying them off in this Spanish and Mexican silver, worth, say, 35 cents on the dollar.

Mr. McDERMOTT. That proposition, if carried out, would necessarily lead to a revolution in those islands. No people on earth could stand such a measure as that. I have asked the chairman of the committee personally whether that difficulty is to be met in any way at all, and I am informed it is not.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. This is unquestionably a most serious objection to the bill of the majority. Possibly it was an oversight on the part of the framers of the measure.

Mr. McDERMOTT. Does the bill reported by the minority provide for that exigency?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. It does in express and in explicit terms. We provide for the redemption and recoinage of all the silver now in circulation, and we provide, too, the method by which debts, public and private, may be discharged. I believe our provisions on this subject to be as nearly just and reasonable as could be devised.

Mr. McDERMOTT. You continue this token value until there is a fair opportunity for recoinage?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. McDERMOTT. Without such a provision, business can not be conducted in those islands.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The interests of those natives who dwell hundreds of miles away from Manila are amply protected in our bill. The interests of both debtor and creditor are, in our judgment, fully protected.

Now, in conclusion I want to say that we have extended the American coinage system to the island of Porto Rico; we have redeemed the Spanish pesos that theretofore circulated in those islands. We have redeemed them at the rate of 60 cents for 1 peso; and I have never heard that any great disaster or financial trouble resulted from our action in that instance. I do not believe for a moment that any serious trouble would follow as a result of the adoption of a like policy in the Philippine Islands. I have listened to and carefully considered all the testimony that has been adduced before the Insular Affairs Committee bearing upon this point. I have heard nothing to make me think for a moment that such would be the case.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied thirty-eight minutes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I regret to say I have not heard all the gentleman's speech. Before he resumes his seat, I should like to know if he can give the committee the reason there is so great a disparity between the local silver money over there and our gold and silver money. In other words, have not the bankers very largely brought about that condition?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I have not a doubt, Mr. Chairman, but that the banks are largely responsible for it; and I have not a doubt that they have profited by it more than anybody else. That the rate of exchange has greatly fluctuated from time to time is, however, only too true, and I am ready to concede that there should be some legislation having for its object the stabilization of the ratio between gold and silver in the Philippine Islands. I do not believe there is any means under the sun by which this could be so quickly, so permanently, and so successfully accomplished as could be done by the extension of the American coinage system to those islands. If that system is good enough for the people of the United States, including Hawaii and Porto Rico, it ought to be good enough for the inhabitants of the Philippines, it seems to me.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What has been done to prevent the banks from thus demonetizing this money?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Nothing, so far as I know.

Trusts.

OF
HON. A. P. GARDNER, OF MASSACHUSETTS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 6, 1903,

On the bill (H. R. 17) requiring all corporations engaged in interstate commerce to file returns with the Secretary of the Treasury disclosing their true financial condition, and of their capital stock, and imposing a tax upon such as have outstanding capital stock unpaid in whole or in part.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Our friends on the other side of the House charge the Republican party with the fact that the number of trusts created since the inauguration of the Republican President in 1897 has vastly increased. I do not think that anyone can deny that fact, but at the same time I think it well to bear in mind that the number of soup houses in the same period has not only vastly diminished but disappeared entirely, so that the rising generation in my State will hardly remember the time, not so long ago, when the very poor of Boston had to be fed at the public expense.

Famine, after all, is a more malignant evil than the combination of capital; so in casting up the account against the trusts I think that an item should be placed to their credit in view of the fact that there is no longer famine in the land.

I do not wish to be understood as saying that the increase in these large aggregations of capital has been the entire cause of the disappearance of the soup house; but I am strongly of the belief that it was the existence of these same combinations which permitted us to break so extensively into foreign markets, and there is but little doubt that the beginning of the present era of prosperity can be traced to the time when our foreign trade so unexpectedly expanded.

It is now over two hundred years since Oliver Goldsmith wrote the Deserted Village. You all remember how he bewailed the fact that "Trade's unfeeling train usurped the land and dispossessed the swain." You can also remember how he prophesied the consequent destruction of the British peasantry and predicted the speedy downfall of Great Britain. None of these things happened, but, on the contrary, Great Britain has increased continually in wealth and power and in the average condition of her poorest inhabitants.

I am not one of those who believe that these large combinations of capital have sapped, or are likely to sap, the vitality of this country. I can not shut my eyes to the fact that the prosperity of the poor and rich alike is far greater now than at any time during my life, but I feel that the time has come when it is fair to ask the question whether or not the advantages of this increased prosperity are being fairly divided among the people. In other words, are the trusts getting more than their fair share of the increased affluence of the nation?

I am inclined to think that they are, and I am inclined to think that the measure which we are now considering is the very best means conceivable at present for equalizing the balance of profits.

I am far from maintaining that experience will not show that further steps are advisable, but it seems to me the part of wisdom to enact the legislation now under consideration and watch results. I fully believe that the bill which we are now discussing will once more reestablish an opportunity for competition to men of small capital in the industries which are now wholly or in part controlled by trusts.

The indictment against the trusts in the minds of the American people consists of three counts:

First. That the present state of affairs is a source of discouragement to ambitious young men of small means. Formerly a young man working for a fair wage could look forward to the time when he might either have saved enough or borrowed enough to set up in business for himself and become his own master. It can not be denied that such opportunities are relatively rarer than heretofore in all the industries on which the trust has laid its hands.

Now, the sentiment which impels a man to efforts to become his own master is neither more nor less than the sentiment for liberty, which has been such a powerful factor in the affairs of this nation. If the fruition of that ambition is to be curtailed I can not but feel that troublous times are in store for this nation; but I believe that free competition can once more be established and that opportunities closed in the last decade can be reopened to men of small capital by the enactment of such legislation as we are contemplating.

I believe that the weapon which the trusts have employed the most for the discomfiture of the competitor with small resources is the railroad rebate: so, if we stop these rebates on freight charges, we shall deprive the trusts of their most powerful and also their most illegitimate weapon.

Publicity is a good thing in itself. It has an additional virtue as a means of enlightenment. The information which we gain from the publicity required under this law will serve as a basis for intelligent legislation in the future if the present legislation requires amendment, as it undoubtedly will. But publicity does not strike at the root of the matter. The sections of this bill dealing with the question of rebates strike exactly at the root, and the one question in my mind is whether or not this legislation is sufficiently drastic absolutely to prohibit these rebates. Time alone will show.

The second count in the indictment against the trusts is that such a concentration of power in the hands of a few men is not in accordance with the principles of true democracy. I am thoroughly in sympathy with that idea, just as I am in sympathy with those who deplore the tendency of men to flock to great cities, where the conditions of life are neither so moral nor so healthy as in the country. Nevertheless, I recognize the fact that the hands of the clock of time can not be turned back. I recognize the fact that this concentration of power is going on every day around us. It is the result of the railroad, the street railway, the telegraph, and the telephone. These utilities have made gigantic combinations possible, and the concentration of power in the hands of a few is a phenomenon quite as apparent in the case of labor organizations as in the case of trusts. It permeates all walks of life.

The third count in the indictment is the contention that trusts can raise or lower prices at will, and are guided in their charges by no economic law other than the limitation of the purchasing capacity of the people. I do not believe that all trusts can raise or lower prices at will. I believe that trusts which deal in the great staple products, such as the sugar trust, the steel trust, the leather trust, etc., are governed by the laws of competition or potential competition, just as much as the individual manufacturer or dealer of thirty years ago. But I believe that certain other trusts, founded on natural or acquired monopolies, can raise or lower their prices in such a way as to procure the maximum profit without considering the possibilities of competition. In this class I include the American Ice Company, a company whose existence, if I am correctly informed, is contingent on the limited docking facilities of New York. I instance this trust, not because it is a well-known Democratic trust, but because it is typical of the kind of combination which can raise or lower prices at will.

To anyone who reads the signs of the times it must be evident that the State must control the trusts or the trusts will control the State. If the trusts were to control the State we should have a plutocracy, a form of government which recorded history shows to have failed in every instance. If, on the other hand, the State were to find that she can not control the trusts under their present ownership, the danger is that the people in their indignation may determine to assume the trusts and thus become both landlord and capitalist. That is socialism with all its doubtful blessings and certain evils. I do not believe that the American people want either socialism or plutocracy. I believe that they are determined to control the trusts, and woe betide the party to which I belong if, in the zenith of our power we fail to enact efficient legislation to this end.

With the cooperation of the State assemblies the legislation before this House will prove itself efficient. The prevention of rebates will at once give a competitive standing to the man of small means. He will, of course, continue to suffer the disadvantage that retail production rests under as compared to wholesale; but, on the other hand, he will have the immense advantage which comes to the man who is constantly looking after his own affairs. He will still be obliged to face the competition of unlimited resource, but he will always have the advantage of being on the spot, watching every dollar that goes out and comes in, while the trust must avail itself of the services of hired agents of varying capacity and varying degrees of fidelity.

It is on competition that this country has been built up. The new-fangled theory that the competitive system has passed away is not worthy of consideration. Without competition there is no progress. It can and must be reestablished, for it is the ordeal of fire in which inflated prices are consumed.

The question naturally presents itself as to whether this legislation, if it had been enacted five years ago, would have prevented the deplorable situation which existed in the anthracite coal fields last summer. I am free to confess that I do not believe that it would have done so. The situation in the anthracite fields arose out of circumstances, partly the creation of the laws of Pennsylvania, and entirely within the jurisdiction of the legislature and the courts of that State. On the one hand there existed a more or less perfect monopoly of capital consequent on the ownership by the railroads of large coal properties. On the other hand there existed a more or less perfect monopoly of labor owing to the existence of the miners' license law, enacted in Pennsylvania some years ago. The first of these quasi monopolies, if it exists as alleged, exists in defiance of law. The second monopoly exists in consequence of a law whose wisdom has often been questioned, but which I forbear, owing to confessed ignorance, from criticising. At all events the situation is entirely in the hands of the State government and courts of Pennsylvania, and the United States, under its compact with the several States of this Union, has no right or power to interfere.

Anyone who has given this matter any thought can not fail to see that the bill before this House must be followed by similar legislation in the various States of the Union. It is in the power of those State legislatures by their cooperation to make this law a success. It is also in their power to make it a failure.

HON. JAMES R. WILLIAMS,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, January 25, 1903,

On the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted, the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of Hon. JOHN L. SHEPPARD, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Texas.

"Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a faithful and distinguished public servant, the House, at the conclusion of the memorial proceedings of this day, shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk be, and is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It was not my pleasure to know Mr. SHEPPARD till he entered the Fifty-seventh Congress. However, he was one of the new members with whom I early became acquainted, and who impressed me from the beginning as a gentleman of stern integrity, sound judgment, and exalted manhood, and a more intimate acquaintance confirmed my first opinion. He was what I should consider a self-made man. Being left an orphan at the tender age of 6 years, and amid circumstances rather adverse, he was not surrounded with opportunities for acquiring knowledge and achieving greatness, but was compelled to make them. With a strong mind, a laudable ambition, and studious application, he entered upon life's early problems with an earnest determination to succeed. By good management and a judicious use of the spare time he could snatch from his duties upon the farm he obtained a very thorough common-school education, to which he subsequently added a wonderful store of useful information by miscellaneous reading. Considering his limited advantages, he soon became well equipped for his chosen profession. Scarcely had he established himself in the practice of law until he was elected prosecuting attorney, and so successfully did he discharge the duties of this office that after holding it a few years he was promoted by the people to the more exalted position of district judge.

Here he soon displayed such a high order of judicial attainments as to distinguish him as one of the ablest jurists on the bench of Texas. For eight years, and by the repeated elections of his people, he continued faithfully and ably to discharge the duties of this high office.

Two years later he was elected to the Fifty-seventh Congress, and, although his term of service in this body was comparatively short, it was long enough to further strengthen him in the confidence and affections of his people and the respect and admiration of his colleagues upon this floor. Mr. SHEPPARD was very modest in the discharge of his Congressional duties, but his opinion and counsel on public questions clearly showed that he had carefully studied them with the mind of a master. He was a man with strong convictions on economic subjects with the ability and courage to express them. He was that kind of a Representative in this House who would have grown into substantial favor, and whose wise counsel in legislative proceedings would have been accepted as safe and sound.

If death had only spared him to his people and his country he was destined to become one of the most useful members of this body. The great State of Texas, so ably represented at the national capital, has manifested no weakness in her wise statesmanship by electing to the American Congress her illustrious son to whose worthy memory we now pay this humble tribute of respect. Mr. SHEPPARD seemed to possess many of the noble attributes of a noble man. A kind citizen, a devoted husband, an affectionate father, a successful lawyer, an able jurist, and a distinguished statesman were the crowning glories of his short but eventful life. As so fittingly expressed by one of his colleagues—

Mr. SHEPPARD is not dead, but still lives—

Lives in his brilliant services to his country, lives in the love and admiration of his people.

And no more deserving tribute could have been paid to his memory than to elect as his successor his own brilliant son, whose wise philosophy and charming eloquence in this House of Representatives have already added new laurels to the honored name of his illustrious father.

On the Mount Rainier National Park, in the State of Washington.

OF

HON FRANCIS W. CUSHMAN,

OF WASHINGTON,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 11, 1903.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 17202) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes—

Mr. CUSHMAN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read:

The Clerk read as follows:

For the management, protection, and improvement of Mount Rainier National Park, construction of roads, bridges, fences, and trails therein, and the improvement of existing roads, $21,000, to be expended under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That the surveys for roads and the work of construction thereof shall be performed under the supervision of an engineer officer of the Army, to be detailed for that purpose on the request of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CUSHMAN. The question of making appropriations for the protection and improvement of the Mount Rainier National Park, in the State of Washington, has been heretofore discussed in rather a hasty manner on this floor. There have been so many peculiar misstatements made in relation to this matter heretofore that it is my purpose to-day to put before this committee and into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the exact facts in relation to this park, when and how it was created, the extent and character of it, and what the Government has heretofore done, or rather what it has not done, in relation to the protection and improvement of this splendid national pleasure ground.

From the date of the passage of the act creating this park, March, 1889, there has never been a line of legislation enacted or a penny of money appropriated therefor. I have on several occasions heretofore endeavored to get an appropriation made for the improvement and protection of this park, but the Government up to this date has never deigned to soil nor sully the natural beauties or the superb scenery of this nature's wonderland by anything so sordid and earthy as an appropriation. I can assure you, to begin with, that, as far at least as the Government is concerned, this region still remains in the full and unimpaired possession of its pristine beauties.

There is in this national park about nine townships; that is, the park is almost square in form, which square is composed of three townships each way, with some slight variations. This makes the park approximately 18 miles square. It contains 207,360 acres.

The Mount Rainier, or, as it is more properly called, the Mount Tacoma National Park, was created by act of Congress approved March 2, 1899, which act will be found in the United States Statutes at Large, volume 30, page 993. The act in full is as follows:

An act to set aside a portion of certain lands in the State of Washington, now known as the Pacific Forest Reserve, as a public park, to be known as the Mount Rainier National Park.

Be it enacted, etc., That all those certain tracts, pieces, or parcels of land lying and being in the State of Washington, and within the boundaries particularly described as follows, to wit: Beginning at a point 3 miles east of the northeast corner of township No. 17 north, of range 6 east of the Willamette meridian; thence south through the central parts of townships Nos. 17, 16, and 15 north, of range 7 east of the Willamette meridian, 18 miles more or less, subject to the proper easterly or westerly offsets, to a point 3 miles east of the northeast corner of township No. 14 north, of range 6 east of the Willamette meridian; thence east on the township line between townships Nos. 14 and 15 north, 18 miles more or less to a point 3 miles west of the northeast corner of township 14 north, of range 10 east of the Willamette meridian; thence northerly subject to the proper easterly or westerly offsets, 18 miles more or less, to a point 3 miles west of the northeast corner of township No. 17 north, of range 10 east of the Willamette meridian (but in locating said easterly boundary, wherever the summit of the Cascade Mountains is sharply and well defined, the said line shall follow the said summit, where the said summit line bears west of the easterly line as herein determined); thence westerly along the township line between said townships Nos. 17 and 18 to the place of beginning, the same being a portion of the lands which were reserved from entry or settlement and set aside as a public reservation by proclamation of the President on the 20th day of February, in the year of our Lord 1893, and of the independence of the United States the one hundred and seventeenth, are hereby dedicated and set apart as a public park, to be known and designated as the Mount Rainier National Park, for the benefit and enjoyment of the people; and all persons who shall locate or settle upon or occupy the same, or any part thereof, except as hereafter provided, shall be considered trespassers and be removed therefrom.

SEC. 2. That said public park shall be under the exclusive control of the Secretary of the Interior, whose duty it shall be to make and publish, as soon as practicable, such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary or proper for the care and management of the same. Such regulations shall provide for the preservation from injury or spoliation of all timber, mineral deposits, natural curiosities, or wonders within said park, and their retention in their natural condition. The Secretary may, in his discretion, grant parcels of ground at such places in said park as shall require the erection of buildings for the accommodation of visitors, all of the proceeds of said leases, and all other revenues that may be derived from any source connected with said park, to be expended under his direction in the management of the same, and the construction of roads and bridle paths therein. And through the lands of the Pacific Forest Reserve, adjoining said park, rights of way are hereby granted, under such restrictions and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may establish, to any railway or tramway company or companies, through the lands of said Pacific Forest Reserve, and also into said park hereby created, for the purpose of building, constructing, and operating a railway, constructing and operating a railway or tramway line or lines, through said lands, also into said park. He shall provide against the wanton destruction of the fish and game found within said park, and against their capture or destruction for the purposes of merchandise or profit. He shall also cause all persons trespassing upon the same after the passage of this act to be removed therefrom, and generally shall be authorized to take all such measures as shall be necessary to fully carry out the objects and purposes of this act.

SEC. 3. That upon execution and filing with the Secretary of the Interior, by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, of proper deed releasing and conveying to the United States the lands in the reservation hereby created, also the lands in the Pacific Forest Reserve which have been heretofore granted by the United States to said company, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, and which lie opposite said company's constructed road, said company is hereby authorized to select an equal quantity of nonmineral public lands, so classified as nonmineral at the time of actual Government survey, which has been or shall be made, of the United States not reserved and to which no adverse right or claim shall have attached or have been initiated at the time of the making of such selection, lying within any State into or through which the railroad of said Northern Pacific Railroad Company runs, to the extent of the lands so relinquished and released to the United States: Provided, That any settlers on lands in said national park may relinquish their rights thereto and take other public lands in lieu thereof, to the same extent and under the same limitations and conditions as are provided by law for forest reserves and national parks.

SEC. 4. That upon the filing by the said railroad company at the local land office of the land district in which any tract of land selected and the payment of the fees prescribed by law in analogous cases, and the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, he shall cause to be executed, in due form of law, and deliver to said company a patent of the United States conveying to it the lands so selected. In case the tract so selected shall at the time of selection be unsurveyed, the list filed by the company at the local land office shall describe such tract in such manner as to designate the same with a reasonable degree of certainty; and within the period of three months after the lands including such tract shall have been surveyed and the plats thereof filed by said local land office, a new selection list shall be filed by said company, describing such tract according to such survey; and in case such tract, as originally selected and described in the list filed in the local land office, shall not precisely conform with the lines of the official survey, the said company shall be permitted to describe such tract anew, so as to secure such conformity.

SEC. 5. That the mineral-land laws of the United States are hereby extended to the lands lying within the said reserve and said park.

Approved March 2, 1899.

Mr. Chairman, about a year ago—on April 1, 1902—I offered on this floor a proposed amendment to the then pending sundry civil appropriation bill proposing to appropriate $10.000 "for the protection and improvement of this park, the construction of fences and trails, and repairing and extension of roads, to be expended under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior." (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 1, 1902, p. 3530.) My proposed amendment was then rejected by a margin of a few votes.

The debate that was had upon that occasion upon my proposed amendment was productive of at least one good result. It served to show the erroneous ideas that prevail and the misconception that exists regarding this park.

The chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. CANNON] at that time raised several specific objections to making any appropriation for this park. Two of the objections that he raised at that time were as follows:

First. That the Northern Pacific Railroad Company owned a considerable portion of the land within the limits of this park.

Second. That the original law creating this park (see section 5 of the act) permits mineral location to be made within this park, and mining to be conducted therein, this not being the case in other national parks.

As I at that time had no intimation that these specific objections would be raised, I was not fully prepared, offhand, to meet them. However, since that time I have secured full information on these two points. At that time I stated in the debate that the Northern Pacific Railroad Company had released the greater part of their lands in the park and taken other lands in lieu thereof; that I did not think the railroad company owned any lands within the limits of the park. The gentleman from Illinois, however, at that time insisted that we could not properly make any appropriation if the company held any lands within the park, and I had not the proof at hand to show that the company did not hold any lands therein.

I made an investigation of this matter quite recently and found that I was entirely correct in my statement then made, that the railroad company did not then, and does not now, own or control a foot of land within the limits of this park. They have long ago exercised their option under the provisions of the act creating this park, and all the land which they had acquired under their railroad grant which lay within the limits of this park, after the park was created, the company surrendered and took other Government land in lieu thereof. They have not a foot of land in this park to-day.

As confirming my statement regarding this point, I read an official letter on this subject recently written to me by the Commissioner of the General Land Office:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 24, 1903.

Hon. FRANCIS W. CUSHMAN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: Replying to your personal inquiry this afternoon as to the amount of lands owned by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company within the limits of the Mount Rainier National Park, in the State of Washington, I have to inform you in reply that an examination of the records of this office discloses the fact that the railroad company referred to owns no lands whatever within the limits of the Mount Rainier National Park, whatever lands it formerly had having been relinquished to the Government and the relinquishments duly accepted.

Very respectfully,

BINGER HERMANN,
Commissioner.

Now, then, regarding the second objection which was made to making any appropriation for this park, to wit, the fact that mining was permitted to be conducted within the park:

Upon the occasion of our former discussion regarding this matter I then insisted, and still insist, that the fact that mining is permitted within this park is no just or reasonable ground for refusing to improve or beautify the park. Remember that this park is now and always has been since its creation under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Interior Department. All mining within the United States is done under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior. Now, then, the Department of the Interior being the Department of this Government that has exclusive jurisdiction of these two matters, the park and the mining, if there was any conflict or impropriety in improving this park while mining is permitted therein, then of course the Department of the Interior would be the Department from which this objection would naturally come. Is not that sound logic? But the situation we have on this floor is that the Secretary of the Interior has several times recommended that an appropriation be made for the improvement of this park, he well knowing at the time that mining could be conducted therein; but the knowledge of this fact did not deter him from recommending that an appropriation be made for this purpose.

In an official communication, which I put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a year ago, the Secretary of the Interior said in reference to this subject:

I have to state that the legislation contemplated—an appropriation for this park—is in line with the recommendations relative to the Mount Rainier National Park contained in my last annual report to the President of the operations of this Department, pages 132 and 133. I have the honor, therefore, to recommend that this amendment be incorporated in the sundry civil bill when it reaches the Senate, and that it may receive the favorable consideration of Congress.

Therefore, we see that the Department having exclusive jurisdiction of this park, and also the Department having jurisdiction of any and all the mining operations that may be conducted therein, recommends that this appropriation be made.

I stated on this floor a year ago that there was practically no mining carried on within the limits of this park. I knew that, because I live reasonably near this park and I know the conditions that exist therein. I was not then prepared to declare offhand that there was no mining carried on in the park, and that no mineral locations had been made therein. I knew that such a statement would be substantially correct, even if it was not literally true.

Since that time I have taken occasion to examine into this matter, and I am to-day prepared to state authoritatively that there is no mining being conducted in that park and that no mineral locations have been made therein.

On this point I wish to read an official letter which I have recently received from the Commissioner of the General Land Office on this subject:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, January 24, 1903.

Hon. FRANCIS W. CUSHMAN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: Replying to your verbal inquiry this afternoon as to the number of mineral locations within the limits of the Mount Rainier National Park, in the State of Washington, I have to inform you that upon investigation I find that there is but one patented placer location within the said park, said location being patented prior to the creation of the park.

Very respectfully, BINGER HERMANN,
Commissioner.

You will observe that the Commissioner of the General Land Office says that there has been but one mineral location made within this entire park, that being a patented placer location, the patent therefor having been issued prior to the creation of the park.

Now, then, in reference to this one mining claim, I happen to know this very claim and the nature of it. It is not a mine, nor a mining claim, nor anything of that nature. It is simply a set of mineral springs that were taken up under the mineral act by old Mr. Longmire years ago. He took this mineral claim, not for the purpose of mining thereon and thereby detracting from the attractions of the park, but for expressly the opposite purpose—to secure title to these valuable mineral springs and erect a hotel at that point and make it an attractive resort for tourists. This he has done.

Now, then, when all this row and bugaboo about the mineral locations in this park has been reduced to its last analysis we find the cold facts to be that during all the years since the white man first set foot in that region clear down to the last tick of the clock there has been but one mineral location made in this great area of nearly 18 miles square, and that location was not made for any purpose in conflict with the purposes for which this park was created, but, on the contrary, was made for the purpose of making the park more attractive as a pleasure resort.

The last annual report of the Secretary of the Interior, being the report for the year 1902, contains a statement in reference to this park, at pages 141 and 142, which I shall at this point insert with my remarks:

MOUNT RAINIER NATIONAL PARK.

By the act of Congress approved March 2, 1899 (30 Stat., 993), a portion of certain lands in the State of Washington, known as the Pacific Forest Reserve, was set aside as a public park, to be known as the Mount Rainier National Park.

Section 2 of this act provides, inter alia:

"That said public park shall be under the exclusive control of the Secretary of the Interior, whose duty it shall be to make and publish, as soon as practicable, such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary or proper for the care and management of the same. Such regulations shall provide for the preservation from injury or spoliation of all timber, mineral deposits, natural curiosities, or wonders within said park, and their retention in their natural condition. He shall provide against the wanton destruction of the fish and game found within said park, and against their capture or destruction for the purposes of merchandise or profit. He shall also cause all persons trespassing upon the same, after the passage of this act, to be removed therefrom, and generally shall be authorized to take all such measures as shall be necessary to fully carry out the objects and purposes of this act."

Section 5 provides—

"That the mineral land laws of the United States are hereby extended to the lands lying within the said reservation and said park."

No regulations for the government of the park "for the preservation from injury or spoliation of all timber, mineral deposits, natural curiosities or wonders within said park and their retention in their natural condition," as required by the regulations, have been promulgated by the Department, as no appropriation has been made by Congress for the management of the reservation and no superintendent could therefore be appointed to enforce such regulations.

In previous annual reports, in discussing the status of this National Park, attention was directed to the advisability of repealing, for administrative reasons, section 5 of the act of March 2, 1899 (30 Stat., 993), as well as the making of appropriations for the protection of the reservation. Considerable interest having been manifested by the public in this park during the year, and a privilege for the transportation of tourists over the roads therein having been granted, it became necessary, in the interest of the Government, to have a representative of the Department therein. Accordingly, the forest superintendent for the State of Washington was placed in charge thereof temporarily. This assignment, however, can not be continued for any length of time without serious interference with the proper performance of the duties of this officer in the enforcement of the regulations of the forestry service in the State. Proper steps have been taken looking to the early survey and marking of the park boundaries. I have, therefore, submitted to Congress through the proper channels an estimate of an appropriation of $3,000 for the management, protection, and the construction of necessary roads and trails in the Mount Rainier National Park during the ensuing fiscal year. It is earnestly recommended that favorable action be had thereon.

One of the points that has always exasperated me in my efforts in trying to secure an appropriation for the improvement of this park is this:

When I go to the Department of the Interior and want them to appoint a superintendent for this park and make rules and regulations for the preservation of the natural beauties and curiosities therein, and the improvement of roads and trails therein, the Secretary of the Interior informs me that he can not do any of these things until Congress makes an appropriation so he can have funds on hand with which to do these things.

Then when I come before Congress asking for an appropriation of money for the improvement of the park objection is made to appropriating any money for this park, because, forsooth, they say there is no superintendent in the park to look after it, and no rules have ever been adopted governing the park, and there are no roads and trails by which people can travel over the park.

During the last four years that I have been a member of Congress I have been chasing myself around that circle trying to find a suitable point to begin. It is perfectly obvious that the place to begin is by making a small appropriation with which work may be begun.

ATTEMPTS TO SECURE LEGISLATION FOR THE PARK.

Since the creation of the Mount Rainier National Park there have been several attempts made to secure appropriations for, or legislation regarding, this park. For the purpose of convenience and reference hereafter I have attempted to gather this data together. I shall not weary the House with reading this material, but will simply print it into the RECORD in connection with my remarks. My idea in printing the same is that whenever in the future it becomes necessary to look up any facts regarding the legislative history of this park that my successor (whoever he may be) will not be obliged to hunt through all the books in the Library to get information, but that the facts in reference to this park may be found collected in one place.

On January 4, 1900, in the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, Congressman JONES, of the State of Washington, introduced a bill (H. R. 5268) in the House of Representatives to amend in certain particulars the original act creating this park. This bill was never reported and was never passed. However, it contains matter of interest and instruction relating to this park. The bill was as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5268) to amend an act entitled "An act to set aside a portion of certain lands in the State of Washington, now known as the Pacific Forest Reserve, as a public park to be known as the Mount Rainier National Park."

Be it enacted, etc., That "An act to set aside a portion of certain lands in the State of Washington now known as the Pacific Forest Reserve, as a public park to be known as the Mount Rainier National Park," be amended as follows:

That section 2 of said act be amended by adding thereto the following provision:

"Any person violating any of the rules and regulations established by the Secretary of the Interior for the preservation from injury or spoliation of all timber, mineral deposits, natural curiosities, or wonders within said park, and their retention in their natural condition, and to provide against wanton destruction of the fish and game found within the said park, and against their capture or destruction for the purpose of merchandise or profit, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof in any court of competent jurisdiction shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $500."

That section 3 of said act be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That upon execution and filing with the Secretary of the Interior by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company of a proper deed releasing and conveying to the United States the lands in the forest reserve hereby created, also the lands in the Pacific Forest Reserve which have been heretofore granted by the United States to the said company, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, and are lying opposite said company's constructed road, said company is hereby authorized to select an equal quantity of land, similar in character and as nearly as possible of equal value with the lands so released, of the nonmineral surveyed public lands so classified as nonmineral at the time of actual Government survey of the United States, not reserved, and to which no adverse right or claim shall have attached or have been initiated at the time of making such selection, lying within any State into or through which the railroad of said Northern Pacific Railroad Company runs, to the extent of the lands so relinquished and released to the United States: Provided, That any settlers on lands in said National Park or Pacific Forest Reserve may relinquish their rights thereto and take other public lands in lieu thereof to the same extent and under the same limitations and conditions as are provided by law for forest reservations and national parks: And provided further, That the affidavit of any person claiming to be a bona fide settler upon any lands heretofore selected or hereafter to be selected under this act prior to and at the time of such selection, corroborated by the affidavit of two witnesses having personal knowledge of such alleged prior settlement, shall be prima facie proof of such prior settlement, and in determining the rights of said company and any such claimant said company shall be deemed the contestant and shall be subject to all the rules and regulations at present governing contests in the land offices of the United States, and said company, prior to the hearing of such claim or contest, shall be required to place in the hands of the receiver of the local land office in which such right or claim is to be tried the sum of $25, to be held by said receiver until the final determination of such claim or contest, and in the event that the claim of the said company to said lands shall not be allowed, then said sum of $25 shall be paid to the party to whom said land is awarded as attorney's fees in such contest; but if said company shall be awarded the land, said $25 shall be returned."

That section 4 of said act be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. That upon the filing by the said railroad company at the local land office of the land district in which any tract of land selected, and the payment of the fees prescribed by law in analogous cases, and the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, he shall cause to be executed in due form of law, and deliver to said company a patent of the United States conveying to it the lands so selected: Provided, however, That no patent shall be issued for lands to which there is any claim adverse to the claim of the said company."

That section 5 of said act be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That the mineral-land laws of the United States are hereby extended to lands lying within the said Pacific Forest Reserve."

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Interior shall make such rules and regulations and take such means as he deems necessary to see that the lands selected by said company in lieu of the lands released under this act shall be as nearly as possible similar in character and of equal value of the lands so released.

In the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress there was introduced in the United States Senate a bill (S. 270), being a bill to prevent trespassers and intruders from entering the Mount Rainier National Park.

This bill passed the Senate on March 17, 1902, but never passed the House, and therefore never became a law.

The following is a copy of this bill:

A bill (S. 270) to prevent trespassers or intruders from entering the Mount Rainier National Park, in the State of Washington.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War, upon the request of the Secretary of the Interior, is hereby authorized and directed to make the necessary detail of troops to prevent trespassers or intruders from entering the Mount Rainier National Park, in Washington, for the purpose of destroying the game or objects of curiosity therein, or for any other purpose prohibited by law or regulation for the government of said reservation, and to remove such persons from said park if found therein.

The Senate Committee on Military Affairs, when considering this bill (S. 270) to prevent trespassers from entering the park, in recommending the bill for passage filed a report which contains matter of interest and information. This report is Senate Report No. 729, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session. The report is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 270) to prevent trespassers or intruders from entering the Mount Rainier National Park, in the State of Washington, report that they have had the same under consideration and recommend its passage without amendment.

The bill contains the following provision:

"That the Secretary of War, upon the request of the Secretary of the Interior, is hereby authorized and directed to make the necessary detail of troops to prevent trespassers or intruders from entering the Mount Rainier National Park, in Washington, for the purpose of destroying the game or objects of curiosity therein, or for any other purpose prohibited by law or regulation for the government of said reservation, and to remove such persons from said park if found therein."

The following statements with reference to and, in conclusion, in support of the bill are furnished by the War Department:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, December 20, 1901.

Respectfully referred to the commanding general Department of the Columbia, Vancouver Barracks, Wash., for remark.

By order of the Secretary of War.

GEO. ANDREWS,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE COLUMBIA,
Vancouver Barracks, Wash., December 27, 1901.

Respectfully referred to the Adjutant-General United States Army.

There are no mounted troops in this department available for this detail.

GEO. M. RANDALL,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, January 4, 1902.

Respectfully referred to the Lieutenant-General Commanding the Army, for remark and recommendation for the information of the Secretary of War.

By order of the Secretary of War:

GEO. ANDREWS,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Washington, D. C., January 8, 1902.

The Lieutenant-General recommends that troops be detailed for this purpose until such time as action can be taken by Congress on the within bill.

THOMAS WARD,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, January 13, 1902.

Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War.

This is a bill authorizing and directing the Secretary of War, upon the request of the Secretary of the Interior, to make details of troops to prevent trespassers or intruders from entering Mount Rainier National Park, in Washington, and to remove such trespassers from said park if found therein.

Under the act of June 18, 1878 (20 Stat. L., 145), it is unlawful to employ any part of the United States forces for the purpose of executing the laws, excepting in such cases and under such circumstances as such employment of said forces may be authorized by the Constitution or act of Congress.

As the bill in question follows the lines of earlier legislation, notably act of June 6, 1900 (31 Stat. L., 618), which authorizes the Secretary of War to make the necessary details of troops to prevent trespassers or intruders from entering the Sequoia National Park, the Yosemite National Park, and the General Grant National Park, in California, it is recommended that this bill meet the approval of this Department.

H. C. CORBIN,
Major-General, Adjutant-General United States Army.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
JUDGE-ADVOCATE-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 21, 1902.

Respectfully submitted to the Secretary of War.

Section 15 of the act of June 15, 1878 (20 Stat. L., 152), explicitly forbids the use of troops as a posse comitatus, or otherwise, in the execution of the laws, "except in such cases and under such circumstances as such employment of said force may be expressly authorized by the Constitution or by act of Congress."

In view of the foregoing prohibition, and as the use of troops contemplated is rather in the nature of a police force than as a military organization, it is believed that in this case, as in those which have arisen in the past, there should be the express sanction of law for the employment in question.

In the acts of March 3, 1883 (22 Stat. L., 626), and June 6, 1900 (31 Stat. L., 618), authorizing a similar use of troops in the case of the Yellowstone National Park, and the Sequoia, Yosemite, and General Grant National parks in California. It is therefore recommended that the bill be returned to the Senate, and that that body be advised that it meets with the approval of the War Department.

GEO. B. DAVIS,
Judge-Advocate-General.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 24, 1902.

Respectfully returned to the chairman Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate, inviting attention to the preceding indorsements hereon and concurring in the views therein expressed.

E. ROOT, Secretary of War.

Your committee find that the Mount Rainier National Park is now one of our national resorts, and that a constantly increasing number of tourists from all parts of the world are attracted to the mountain on account of its unsurpassed grandeur and the extent and peculiar formation of its many glaciers. Those journeying to the mountain have heretofore left the usual lines of railway or steamboat travel at the city of Tacoma and proceeded by stage to the foothills. A new line of railroad is now being built to within a few miles of the mountain, and the number of visitors will, therefore, in all probability, increase very rapidly on account of the increased transportation facilities.

The mountain is something over 14,444 feet in height and rises very abruptly from the snow line and is considered by mountain climbers to be one of the most picturesque and striking mountain peaks in the world. The national park surrounding the peak contains many streams which are attractive to fishermen, and the forests abound in game. At the present time it is practically impossible to protect the natural scenery against vandalism or to prevent trespassers from entering upon the park.

There are ample facilities for conveying supplies to a detail of troops located within the park, and there are numerous suitable locations for headquarters. As soon as the detail of troops is made and further amendments to the law are enacted, the Secretary of the Interior will promulgate rules and regulations against the destruction of fish and game found within the park, and against their capture and destruction for the purpose of merchandise or profit. Such regulations, under act of Congress approved March 2, 1899 (30 Stat. L., 993), shall provide for the preservation from injury or spoliation of all timber and natural curiosities within the park and their retention in their natural condition.

In the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress there was also introduced in the United States Senate a bill (S. 255) for the improvement of the Mount Rainier National Park.

This bill passed the Senate on March 31, 1902, but never passed the House, and therefore never became a law.

The following is a copy of this bill:

A bill (S. 255) for the improvement of the Mount Rainier National Park, in the State of Washington.

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000, to be expended under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, for the purpose of improving the Mount Rainier National Park, in the State of Washington, and for the protection of the park and the construction and repair of bridges, fences, and trails, and improvement and construction of roads.

The Senate Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, in recommending the bill S. 255 for passage, filed a report which contains information proper to be here reproduced in connection with the history of this matter now under consideration. This report is Senate Report No. 790, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session. The report is as follows:

The Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, to whom was referred the bill (S. 255) for the improvement of the Mount Rainier National Park, in the State of Washington, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to submit the following report:

By act of Congress, approved March 2, 1899 (30 Stat., 993), a portion of the lands of the State of Washington, known as the Pacific Forest Reserve, was set aside for a public park, to be known as the Mount Rainier National Park.

This act provided against the wanton destruction of fish and game found within the park and against their capture or destruction for purposes of merchandise or profit. Trespassing was also prohibited and provision was made for the promulgation of rules and regulations to preserve the wonderful natural scenic effects of the park against destruction.

During the Fifty-sixth Congress legislation was proposed for the assignment of troops to the Mount Rainier National Park for the purpose of preventing trespassers and intruders from entering the same to destroy game or objects of curiosity therein. The legislation then asked for set aside an appropriation of $20,000 for the improvement of the park and the construction of roads. This proposed legislation met with the approval of the honorable Secretary of the Interior, who made the following statement:

* * * "I have to state that the legislation contemplated * * * is in line with the recommendations relative to Mount Rainier National Park, contained in my last annual report to the President of the operations of this Department, pages 132-133.

"I have the honor, therefore, to recommend that this amendment be incorporated in the sundry civil bill when it reaches the Senate and that it may receive the favorable consideration of Congress.

"Very respectfully,

"E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary."

A bill (S. 270) providing for the assignment of troops to the park by the Secretary of War, upon the request of the Secretary of the Interior, has been favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, and an appropriation for the construction of roads and trails is deemed eminently proper. A large and constantly increasing number of tourists visit the park each summer, although at the present time no satisfactory trails, roads, or bridges have been constructed within the limits of the reserve or park. Such improvement is needed, and for the accommodation of the general public should be made at once.

The mountainous country within the park constitutes scenic beauties unsurpassed anywhere in the world. An abrupt peak rises nearly 15,000 feet from the snow line and is pronounced by mountain climbers from all parts of the globe to be one of the most, if not the most, striking mountain peaks in the world. The glaciers surrounding the park, the water courses, the forests, and the canyons are of the greatest possible interest, and the protection provided for and the improvements to be secured by the proposed legislation are to be commended.

We therefore recommend that the bill do pass without amendment.

On January 11, 1901, Senator FOSTER submitted in the United States Senate an amendment providing for the protection of the Mount Rainier National Park in the State of Washington by authorizing a detail of troops for the purpose of guarding the same, and proposing to appropriate $20,000 for the improvement of said park, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed. (See p. 852 of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, second session Fifty-sixth Congress, January 11, 1901.)

However, this proposed amendment was not adopted by the Senate, and therefore was never incorporated into the sundry civil bill, and said appropriation was not made.

On April 3, 1902, Senator FOSTER submitted, in the United States Senate, an amendment proposing to appropriate $25,000 for the purpose of improving the Mount Rainier National Park in the State of Washington, and for the protection of the park, the construction and repair of bridges, fences, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations. (See p. 3594 of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, first session Fifty-seventh Congress, April 3, 1902.)

However, this proposed amendment was not adopted by the Senate, and therefore never incorborated into the sundry civil appropriation bill, and said appropriation was not made.

On June 18, 1902, Senator FOSTER submitted in the United States Senate an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,000 for the improvement of Mount Rainier National Park, in State of Washington, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was ordered printed, and, with accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations. (See p. 6977 of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, first session Fifty-seventh Congress, June 18, 1902.)

On June 25, 1902, the United States Senate favorably reported and incorporated into the general deficiency appropriation bill the following amendment:

Improvement of Mount Rainier National Park, Washington: For protection and improvement of the park and repairing and extension of roads, to be expended under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, to continue available during the fiscal year 1903, $2,000.

In the conference between the House and the Senate this amendment quoted above was stricken from the bill, and no appropriation whatever was made in the bill for the park.

It is not with any egotistic idea of magnifying my own labors that I state that I have had untold trouble in gathering together the data and having the necessary investigations made with reference to this park.

The first efforts I made to secure an appropriation for this park were met with the objection that there was nothing definite upon which to act, that no official investigation had been made, that no surveys had been made, that no estimates of any kind had been made which could be used as the basis of any appropriation.

Two years and a half ago I secured the aid and assistance of Mr. Frederick G. Plummer, one of the most prominent civil engineers of the State of Washington. He was then making some investigations in this park for the United States Geological Survey, and has since become a part of the staff of that department of the Government.

I requested Mr. Plummer to make for me a map of this region, with especial reference to the proposed roadway, and also to make a preliminary survey and estimate of the cost of building a wagon road within the park.

I wish at this time to make grateful acknowledgment of the assistance I received from Mr. Plummer in this matter. Whatever measure of success that may meet my efforts in relation to this park will, in a large degree, be due to his valuable and energetic assistance. I propose to include in my remarks the correspondence of Mr. Plummer in relation to this matter:

TACOMA, WASH., October 30, 1900.

Hon. FRANCIS W. CUSHMAN,
Tacoma, Wash.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your favor of August 25 making inquiry as to the proposed road to Paradise Park in the Mount Rainier National Park and requesting maps of the same, it gives me pleasure to hand you herewith a large map of the Mount Rainier Forest Reserve, which includes the National Park, and also a preliminary map of the proposed road showing the points of interest which it would render accessible.

Briefly, the situation is as follows:

The Mount Rainier National Park contains some of the grandest scenery in the United States.

The season for tourists and visitors will be from June 1 to October 31.

Paradise Park is only accessible at present by a very poor road and trail.

A road can be built from the end of the present county road, at the boundary of the forest reserve, to Paradise Park. There are no natural obstacles or engineering problems that are serious.

The building of such a road is absolutely necessary to permit the enjoyment of this wonderland by the people.

The reserve and park are under the direct control of the General Government. The proposed road should be built by the General Government for the free use of the people, subject to rules and regulations by the Secretary of the Interior.

This national park deserves an elaborate description, but for the purpose of this presentation it should be borne in mind that it includes within its boundaries—

1. Mount Rainier (or Tacoma), the greatest and most beautiful of the snow peaks in this country. Its altitude is 14,526 feet, and its mass sufficient to fill Lake Erie.
2. A wonderful system of living glaciers, of which the largest is, alone, greater in extent than the combined area of all the glaciers on Mount Blanc, in Switzerland.
3. The Sluiskin and Tatoisch ranges of volcanic peaks, more beautiful in profile than the Tetons of the Yellowstone.
4. Canyons 3,000 to 5,000 feet deep.
5. A large number of beautiful lakes.
6. Dozens of cascades and waterfalls, the highest of which is 900 feet.
7. Mineral springs having various medicinal properties and of temperatures from 40° to 90° F.
8. A wide field for geologists, botanists, and mountaineers.
9. The magnificent views of the surrounding mountains and valleys, unlimited only by earth curvature, and are in extent about 20,000 square miles.

The proposed road should begin at the end of the present county road at the west boundary of the forest reserve, and its general course should be up valleys of the Nisqually and Paradise rivers to Paradise Park. The direct course would have too steep a gradient and compels introduction of a number of "loops" which, besides bringing the grade within desirable limits, will permit the passing en route of a number of the chief attractions of the park, and in addition will be a novelty in itself.

The road will have a total length of about 24.5 miles, and in this distance would pass the mineral springs mentioned above, the white-granite cliffs of the Nisqually, the foot of the great Nisqually glacier with its ice caves and terminal moraines, the columnar basalt cliffs, Tahoma Falls, Narada Falls, the Upper Falls, and Sluiskin Falls, and thence through a garden of wild flowers to Camp of the Clouds and Alta Vista.

I confidently believe that no road of equal length can offer more attractions along its route, in addition to the grand scenery which will reward the tourist at its terminus in the park.

For information I submit the following data regarding the proposed road, based upon personal reconnoissance:

The point of beginning, at the west boundary of the reserve, has an altitude of 1,800 feet. The mineral springs are 2,700 feet. The distance is 9 miles. The road will therefore have a grade of about 2 per cent for the first 9 miles.

The foot of the Nisqually glacier is 4 miles above the springs, and has an elevation of 3,300 feet. The road grade will therefore be about 3 per cent for the next 4 miles.

The point in Paradise Park which should be reached has an altitude of 5,600 feet, and the distance (with the loops mentioned) will be about 11.5 miles and will have a grade of 4 per cent, which will be the maximum grade of the road.

The surface of the road should be at least 12 feet wide.

The first 13 miles will be along the Nisqually Valley, and about one-half of it will be sidehill work in gravel and soil with little rockwork. The remaining 11.5 miles will be mostly sidehill work with considerable loose rock and bowlders. It is probable that ledges will be encountered that will make blasting necessary.

Of eight bridges that will be needed, two were built by the county before the General Government assumed control and are in good condition at the present time.

PRELIMINARY ESTIMATES OF COST.

9 miles of road, at $2,000 per mile	$18,000
4 miles of road, at $3,000 per mile	12,000
11.5 miles of road, at $4,000 per mile	46,000
	76,000
Bridges, trestles, and culverts	6,000
Engineering and contingencies	8,000
Total	90,000

Very truly, yours,

FRED. G. PLUMMER.

I brought to the attention of the honorable Secretary of the Interior the letter and estimate of Mr. Plummer and also a map which Mr. Plummer had prepared for me of this proposed road way.

The Secretary had already recommended an appropriation of $3,000 be made by Congress for the management, protection, and improvement of this park. I explained to the Secretary of the Interior that under the estimate of Mr. Plummer there could be built 9 miles of road at $2,000 per mile, or for a total of $18,000. The honorable Secretary, after examining these figures and hearing the arguments, consented to increase his recommendation of $3,000, heretofore made, by an additional recommendation of $18,000 more for the purpose of building this 9 miles of road. The Secretary therefore now recommends that we appropriate a total of $21,000 for this park. He makes that recommendation in an official letter to Mr. CANNON, the chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations. That letter is as as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 2, 1903.

Hon. J. G. CANNON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

SIR: In the estimates of this Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and in the annual report of the operations of this Department for the past fiscal year it was recommended that $3,000 be appropriated by Congress for the management, protection, and improvement of the Mount Rainier National Park, in the State of Washington. Since that time my attention has been called to the advisability of the construction of a wagon road from the edge of the Mount Rainier Forest Reserve across the same and into the Mount Rainier National Park, a distance of approximately 24½ miles, and with a view to securing authority for the construction thereof, I desire to increase the estimate heretofore submitted by the addition thereto of $18,000.

I have the honor to recommend, therefore, that the following clause be inserted in the sundry civil bill, to wit:

"For the management, protection, and improvement of Mount Rainier National Park, construction of roads, bridges, fences, and trails therein, and the improvement of existing roads, $21,000, to be expended under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That the surveys for roads and the work of construction thereof shall be performed under the supervision of an engineer officer of the Army, to be detailed for that purpose on the request of the Secretary of the Interior."

This national park, it is stated in a paper prepared by Mr. F. G. Plummer, of the Geological Survey, includes within its boundaries:

1. Mount Rainier (or Tacoma), the greatest and most beautiful of the snow peaks in this country. Its altitude is 14,526 feet, and its mass sufficient to fill Lake Erie.
2. A wonderful system of living glaciers, of which the largest is, alone, greater in extent than the combined area of all the glaciers on Mount Blanc, in Switzerland.
3. The Sluiskin and Tatoisch ranges of volcanic peaks, more beautiful in profile than the Tetons of the Yellowstone.
4. Canyons 3,000 to 5,000 feet deep.
5. A large number of beautiful lakes.
6. Dozens of cascades and waterfalls, the highest of which is 900 feet.
7. Mineral springs having various medicinal properties and of temperatures from 40 to 90° F.
8. A wide field for geologists, botanists, and mountaineers.
9. The magnificent views of the surrounding mountains and valleys are limited only by earth curvature, and are in extent about 20,000 square miles.

These natural curiosities or wonders within this reservation can not be advantageously seen by the traveling public interested therein, nor can the Department satisfactorily provide for the preservation from injury or spoliation of timber, mineral deposits, natural curiosities, or wonders within the park, and their retention in their natural condition, as required by the act of March 2, 1899 (30 Stats., 994), unless proper roads are constructed therein.

There is transmitted herewith, for the information of the committee, a copy of a report from the Director of the Geological Survey and accompanying inclosures, giving detailed information regarding the park and the road proposed to be constructed therein.

Very respectfully, E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

Mr. Chairman, in my investigation of this subject it became necessary for me to go at length into the investigation of the appropriations made for other national parks in order to make a comparison between these other parks and the one located in my State.

I propose to print into the RECORD at this point all the data on the general subject of national parks which I have secured in the course of this investigation.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 3, 1903.

Hon. F. W. CUSHMAN, House of Representatives.

SIR: Your letter has been received requesting a tabular statement of the various national parks in the United States, the dates of creation, number of square miles in each, and total amount of money appropriated therefor, respectively, together with a statement of the appropriations made for each, by years.

In response thereto I have the honor to state that the Department will endeavor to furnish you with the information as to the national parks under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior at an early a day as practicable. No occasion has heretofore arisen, however, for the compilation of a statement of these appropriations, and some little time will necessarily be consumed in collecting the data.

The following national parks are under the supervision of the branches of the Government hereinafter indicated, to wit:

The National Zoological Park, in the District of Columbia, having an area of 170 acres, was established March 2, 1889, and is under the supervision of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution.

The Chicamauga and Chattanooga National Park, in Georgia and Tennessee, having an area of 6,195 acres, was established August 19, 1890, and the Antietam Battle Field National Park, in Maryland, having an area of 43 acres, established August 20, 1890, are, respectively, under the supervision of the Secretary of War.

The Rock Creek Park, in the District of Columbia, having an area of 1,606 acres, established September 27, 1890, is under the supervision of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The Shiloh National Park, in Tennessee, having an area of 3,000 acres, was established December 27, 1894; the Gettysburg National Park, in Pennsylvania, having an area of 877 acres, established February 11, 1895, and the Vicksburg National Park, in Mississippi, having an area of 1,233 acres, established February 21, 1899, are, respectively, under the Secretary of War.

Information as to the various appropriations that have been made from time to time by Congress for the protection, improvement, and management of these parks can be procured from the several officers having supervision thereof.

Very respectfully, E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February, 6, 1903.

Hon. FRANCIS W. CUSHMAN, House of Representatives.

SIR: In further reply to your letter of the 31st ultimo I have the honor to transmit herewith a tabular statement showing the national parks under this Department, the location, area, and date of establishment of each, together with the aggregate appropriations by Congress therefor, respectively.

There is also transmitted herewith a tabular statement of the said national parks, giving the appropriations from the date of establishment thereof to the present time, by years.

Very respectfully, E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

Mr. Chairman, I call especial attention to the foregoing tabulation, because it shows all the national parks in the United States, and particularly because it shows that the Mount Rainier National Park, in the State of Washington, is the only national park in the United States under the jurisdiction of the Interior Department for which there has never been a dollar of Government money appropriated. Of course I make an exception of the Wind Cave Park, because that was only created thirty days ago, and there has not been time enough to even consider the matter of an appropriation for that park.

Memorandum as to appropriations for national parks.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, I am going to conclude my remarks in reference to this national park and the appropriation of $21,000 which I have asked for in the amendment which I have offered. It will be observed by members that I have offered my amendment for exactly the same amount which has been recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, and I have drawn my amendment in the same language which the Secretary and myself agreed upon in the discussion of this matter, and which proposed amendment the Secretary incorporates in his official letter to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, which I have heretofore read.

There are certainly no reasons why my amendment should not be adopted. Every year and every year we pass appropriation bills on this floor making appropriations for the other national parks in the United States. I only ask that the national park in my State, superior in beauty and surpassing in scenery any other national park on this continent, shall receive a portion of the money that we are yearly appropriating for national parks.

At the conclusion of Mr. CUSHMAN'S speech Mr. CANNON of Illinois offered as a substitute for the amendment proposed by Mr. CUSHMAN, the following:

Mount Rainier National Park: To enable the Secretary of War to cause a survey to be made of the most practicable route for a wagon road into said park and toward the construction of said road after the survey herein provided for shall have been made, $10,000.

The substitute was adopted in place of the amendment offered by Mr. CUSHMAN (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 11, 1903, p. 2161, second session Fifty-seventh Congress) and afterwards said substitute was agreed to in the Senate, and as a part of said sundry civil bill was approved by the President March 3, 1903, and became a part of said law.

HON. JOHN LAMB,
OF VIRGINIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 22, 1903,

On the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted, the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of the Hon. JAMES MONTRAVILLE MOODY, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of North Carolina.

"Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a faithful and distinguished public servant, the House at the conclusion of the memorial proceedings shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk be, and he is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased."

Mr. LAMB said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Hon. JAMES M. MOODY was a useful member of the Committee on Agriculture. I knew him well and watched his course on that committee. He was an attentive listener to all the hearings. He seldom addressed the committee, but when he did he expressed himself with force and earnestness. His appeal for consideration of the bill establishing "The National Appalachian Forest Reserve" was impressive and convincing, while the report he made on that measure to this House was clear and strong, showing the great necessity for the work and the immense advantages to follow its establishment.

I attended the funeral of Major MOODY, and witnessed the last sad rites over the remains of our colleague. The scene was impressive, and gave a remarkable evidence of the esteem and affection in which he was held by the community where he was born and reared. A stream of people from the town of Waynesville and the surrounding country passed in and out of the home of the dead Congressman to take a last look at their friend and Representative. Rain had been falling continuously for several hours. This did not deter the hardy yeomanry of the counties from attending the funeral of their friend. They stood in long lines with saddened countenances—the sons of men whom I have watched in battle so often, and seen their prostrate forms cover acres of mother earth after the clash of arms had ceased and the cannon's roar had died away.

It was a strange circumstance, that just as the hour for the funeral services arrived the clouds lifted, the sun came out. Above the mists of the clouds shone the mountain peaks. It was a glorious panorama! The lowlander feasted his eyes and wished he was an artist or a word painter. When the procession was over, and Mother Earth held securely another of her toilers, the rain again fell steadily, and all nature appeared in sympathy with the surrounding gloom and sorrow.

I watched the mourning crowd disperse. I noted the ex-Confederate soldiers, spoke to several of them, and heard one, who was in charge of an order of knights to which the deceased belonged, say, "Close up, men." I had heard the expression before. Had seen North Carolina's sons "close up" on many a hard-fought field.

We know the early and later history of the Old North State. She gave the first martyr to the Revolution; the first to the glorious struggle for the rights of the South, and the first for the Cuban independence.

North Carolina has furnished to the country many military and civic heroes who will occupy a high niche in the temple of fame, but no more touching tribute to the rank and file of her brave sons can be made than the recording in her archives of the names of these three heroes.

Their deeds will be mentioned and their names repeated by the coming generations of the Old North State while the restless ocean laves her eastern shores and the silent mountains, that look eternal, guard her western confines.

Amidst the charms and inspirations of western North Carolina our deceased colleague grew up, struggling with difficulties and advancing step by step until he was recognized as one of her most useful citizens and honored by her people with various positions of trust and responsibility.

I can best portray his public and private character and contribute my share in preserving a record of his life by quoting a part of a tribute to Major MOODY found in one of the papers of his State a few days after his sad and untimely end.

As a representative of the bar he was one of the most successful of the State. He was especially prominent as a crminal lawyer. His public service gave general satisfaction to all classes of people regardless of faith or party. As State senator, as Congressman, no man ever labored more enthusiastically for the good of his county; he seemed to have every man's interest at heart and he labored hard that he might do the best for each and all. He was devoted to his work and no social occasion ever persuaded him away from duty. But it is not necessary to speak at length of his public services. Their character is the best attestation of their worth and sincerity. They glow upon his country's history. They burn in shimmering glory upon his country's banner. They are written upon hearts of multitudes with a stylus of fire.

As a man he was a center of attraction, a favorite among all classes of people. To know him was to love him; his great heart and personal magnetism, his manly sympathy and noble affability, charmed thousands into his friendship. On this ground many men of the opposite political faith forgot their own party and voted for him.

In the passing away of so many members of the Fifty-seventh Congress we are reminded that—

Death rides on every passing breeze
He lurks in every flower.

We have seen the youngest and the strongest fall before the "grim monster."

Who will be the next victim?

The youth in life's green spring and he who goes
In the full strength of years, matron and maid,
The speechless babe, and the gray-headed man—
Shall one by one be gathered to thy side,
By those, who in their turn shall follow them.

The Fifty-seventh Congress Appropriations for the Government Service Ample, Economical, and Carefully Considered.

HON JOSEPH G. CANNON,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 3, 1903.

The House having under consideration the conference report on the bill (H. R. 17493) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for prior years, and for other purposes—

Mr. CANNON said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The appropriations made by the second session of the Fifty-seventh Congress, including the permanent annual appropriations and appropriations for the postal service, amount to $753,484,018.29.

I will submit and print as a part of my remarks the usual table giving the history of the appropriations of the session, in which there are indicated, by titles of the regular bills, the amounts estimated and the amounts of each during the several stages of their consideration up until the final agreements thereon, together with the amounts appropriated for the current fiscal year at the last session of Congress.

By this table it is shown that the regular bills for the annual support of the Government appropriate in the aggregate for the next fiscal year $596,082,625.82, being an increase of $282,151.72 over the appropriations of the last session, and that all appropriations authorized at this session, other than those known as permanent annual appropriations, amount to $620,894,198.29, or $55,809,078.26 less than the like appropriations for the last session. In connection with the appropriations made at the last session for the current fiscal year, however, it is proper to say that they include $50,130,000 on account of the isthmian canal and over $6,000,000 more on account of deficiencies than was appropriated at the present session.

Comparing by bills the appropriations of this session with those made last session, the following differences are indicated:

On the Agricultural bill, an increase of $769,200.

On the Army bill, a reduction of $13,591,383.58, which in itself is a proof of the good faith of the Republican party in its pledges to reduce and maintain the military establishment of the country on the lowest possible effective basis.

On the Diplomatic and Consular bill, an increase of $10,325.

On the District of Columbia bill, an increase of $103,027.03.

On the Fortification bill, a reduction of $110,538.78.

On the Indian bill, a reduction of $473,077.63.

On the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial bill an increase of $2,199,272.16, made up chiefly on account of the transfer of $926,460 to this bill from the Sundry Civil bill for expenses of the permanent Census Office and by the addition of $500,000 to enable the Attorney-General to enforce more effectually the interstate commerce and antitrust laws.

On the Military Academy bill a reduction of $1,974,075.75.

On the Naval bill an increase of $3,020,928.30.

On the Pension appropriation bill an increase of $5,370.

On the Post-Office bill an increase of $15,084,951.

No River and Harbor bill was passed at this session. The one enacted last session appropriated $26,771,442.

On the Sundry Civil bill, an increase of $22,109,595.97. In this bill there is included $20,233,150 for the continuation of river and harbor improvements under authorized contracts, which sum is an increase of $14,464,392.50 over the amounts appropriated at the last session.

For deficiencies, as stated before, a reduction is made of $6,488,434.85.

For miscellaneous purposes, carried in separate acts, it is estimated that an aggregate of $3,250,000 is appropriated; an increase of $527,204.87 over the last session.

On account of permanent appropriations, which, as their name implies, are permanent or continuing provisions of law providing for certain expenditures, such as interest on the public debt, the requirements of the sinking fund, the expenses of collecting the customs revenues, and certain trust funds, an increase for 1904 appears, according to the estimates of the Treasury Department, of $8,668,600 over the aggregate of the estimates for the current year of 1903. Of this sum $5,000,000 is for redemption of national-bank notes out of moneys deposited for that purpose by the banks, $1,500,000 is for refund to importers excess of deposits made by them, and a new item of $700,000 is from proceeds of sales of public lands which were dedicated by the act passed at the last session of this Congress to the reclamation of arid lands in certain States and Territories.

An examination of the details of the permanent appropriation estimates also discloses the gratifying result of a decrease in the annual interest charge on the national debt of $2,000,000 for the ensuing fiscal year.

The sum-total of appropriations for the two fiscal years 1903 and 1904, made by this Congress, amount to $1,554,108,514.84. This sum exceeds the aggregate of appropriations made by the previous Congress for the years 1901 and 1902 by $113,619,075.97, and yet an analysis of the appropriations made by the two Congresses shows that the Congress just expiring has appropriated alone for the Navy, for the Postal Service, for improvements of rivers and harbors, and for the construction of public buildings the sum of $115,382,136.49 more than was appropriated for those objects by the preceding Congress for 1901 and 1902.

To state it another way: This Congress has given in excess of appropriations made by the Fifty-sixth Congress $17,490,946.89 toward the increase of the Navy, an expenditure that is indorsed by the whole people, for by this generous provision for the upbuilding of our Navy they realize that our country is placed in the position where we can maintain our rights on the high seas of the world and repel from our shores, with the aid of our now nearly perfect system of coast defenses, the invasion of any foreign power.

For the Postal Service the increase in appropriations over those of the previous Congress amounts to $54,377,221, a sum greater than that service cost in any fiscal year prior to that of 1888; and yet the service is now more nearly self-sustaining than it has been at any time during the past eighteen years. The universal and unprecedented prosperity throughout the country is unmistakably attested through this most sensitive pulse of our whole system of governmental machinery.

For the improvement of our waterways and the harbors for commerce along our seaboard the appropriations for the periods mentioned show an increase of $33,526,120.75.

Public buildings authorized by this Congress, to be constructed in our chief cities and towns, have required appropriations of $9,987,847.85 more than was appropriated by the Fifty-sixth Congress.

And in addition to these increased appropriations, made at the two sessions of this Congress, we have appropriated $50,130,000 toward the final and speedy achievement of our greatest national ambition, the construction of the Isthmian Canal.

The Republican Administration of our Government, the dominance of Republican policies in both branches of Congress since 1897, has given us a system of taxation that has produced a National Treasury richer than was ever enjoyed by any nation of the earth, and has rendered possible these great expenditures for the public welfare.

Chronological history of appropriation bills, second session of the Fifty-seventh Congress; estimates and appropriations for the fiscal year 1903-4; and appropriations for the fiscal year 1902-3.

OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 3, 1903.

The House having under consideration the conference report on the bill (H. R. 17493) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for prior years, and for other purposes—

Mr. LIVINGSTON said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I submit herewith a tabular statement showing the appropriations for the fiscal years 1895 and 1896, made by the Fifty-third Congress, which was controlled in both of its branches by the Democratic party and during Mr. Cleveland's Administration of the Government, and the appropriations made by the Fifty-seventh Congress just closing, for the fiscal years 1903 and 1904. The latter contrasted with the former bears upon its face its own criticism.

During the period first named, the total of appropriations amounted to only $989,239,205.69, while for the latter period they reached the astonishing total of $1,554,108,514.84; and, adding thereto the contract obligations in excess of appropriations made, namely, $262,711,465 authorized at the first session of this Congress, together with approximately $35,000,000 authorized during the second session just closing, we have a sum exceeding $1,850,000,000, or dangerously close to the two-billion-dollar mark for a single Congress.

I will not undertake to analyze the figures as they appear in this table, but will content myself with calling attention to only a few of the salient facts developed therein. During the Fifty-third Congress the total appropriations for the military and naval service of the Government, not including those for pensions or for the maintenance of Soldiers' Homes, aggregated $106,791,223.04, or a little more than one-tenth of the whole appropriations made. During the Fifty-seventh Congress, which made appropriations for the current and for the coming fiscal year, the sums devoted to these objects amounted to $348,370,478.11, or more than three times what these necessary branches of our public service cost under Democratic legislation and administration, and is nearly one-fourth of all of the appropriations made for the entire Government for the two years.

The Legislative, Executive, and Judicial appropriation bill, which provides substantially for the civil list of the Government, has been increased, over and above the amounts that were found sufficient during the fiscal years 1895 and 1896, by more than $9,000,000.

The Sundry Civil or omnibus bill for 1895 and for 1896 has been increased by this Congress more than $62,000,000.

The deficiencies which this Congress has seen fit to make up in appropriations for the Republican Administration are more than double those which resulted during the administration of the Government in 1895 and 1896.

The miscellaneous acts carrying appropriations during the Fifty-third Congress amounted to less than a million dollars, while those of this Congress will probably foot up to not less than $6,000,000.

The permanent annual appropriations, which provide chiefly for the interest on the national debt and for the requirements of the sinking fund, have been increased more than $30,000,000.

Nothing short of a revision of the tariff on a revenue basis and the administration of the Government under the wise and prudent methods of the Democratic party can be looked to to bring about a reduction in the national expenditures, exhibited by these figures in such appalling proportions.

Statement of appropriations made at each session of the Fifty-third Congress and at each session of the Fifty-seventh Congress, for the fiscal years 1894-95 and 1895-96 and for the fiscal years 1902-3 and 1903-4, respectively.

Statehood Bill.

OF

HON. JOHN KEAN,

OF NEW JERSEY,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

February 4, 1903.

The Senate having under consideration the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States—

Mr. KEAN said:

I am opposed, Mr. President, to the passage of this bill. I do not believe it wise at the present time that it should be passed. To my mind there is no obligation which has been put upon the Republican majority here to pass this bill. I know it has been contended that Republican platforms have recommended, or, rather, directed it so, but I can not find in any Republican platform any direction to the Congress of the United States to pass an omnibus statehood bill. I know in its platform of 1896 the Republican convention provided that—

We favor the admission of the remaining Territories at the earliest practicable date, having due regard to the interests of the people of the Territories and of the United States.

There is in that no direction to Congress to admit at once Territories as States.

In the platform of the Republican party of 1900, which is cited here as being an imperative demand, there is this provision:

We favor home rule for, and the early admission to statehood of, the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, and Oklahoma.

I agree, Mr. President, with those platforms, and I do favor the early admission to statehood of Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma, but I do not think that at the present time Arizona and New Mexico are up to the standard which we should exact from a State.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], in a very able and interesting speech, made the statement that, though not bound by the letter of the law to admit these Territories as States, we are bound morally to admit them now and that the course of history and the general treatment accorded to these Territories constitute a moral contractual obligation. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], in his very able and scholarly speech, to my mind, showed conclusively that we are not bound to admit these Territories, either legally or morally, until the Congress of the United States sees fit to do so.

I do not think the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] or the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and I differ at all. We think Congress is the power which should act, and when Congress sees fit to act the Territories become States. Now, there may be differences of opinion as to when that action should be taken and how the States should be fitted. I do not think that in the statements made here Arizona and New Mexico have been shown to be fitted for statehood.

There is an old saying, What constitutes a State? "Neither walls, theaters, porches, nor senseless equipage make States, but men who are able to rely upon themselves."

Men who are able to rely upon themselves. Not size, not wealth, not senseless equipage nor cities, but men, population, and a population capable of relying upon itself.

Now, let us consider for a moment the population of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico. They are coupled by many Senators who have spoken on this bill as being alike, but they are vastly different in population, although they are similar in being equally unfitted, in my opinion, for self-government at the present time. As to New Mexico, the governor says in his last report:

Excepting the Indians, who occupy reservations or pueblos of their own, the inhabitants of New Mexico are like those of any other American Commonwealth, only that the majority of them are of Spanish or Mexican descent, as those of lower New York are of Dutch, of eastern Pennsylvania of German, or lower Louisiana are of French blood.

Here the governor explains the situation exactly. He tries to mitigate it by comparing the Spanish or Mexican descent population with those of the Dutch, German, or French in other parts of the United States—a comparison which is ridiculous on its face. When the governor says "Spanish or Mexican descent" he means Mexican (Spaniards who mixed with the Indians generations ago, leaving only their language and laziness behind). There are few families in New Mexico who can claim Spanish descent, or do claim it, and they resent being called Mexicans. They are Castilians. They are as different from Mexicans as the whites are from negroes. They control the Mexican, or peon, who does their bidding in all matters, especially political. The few Spanish families in New Mexico control the political situation among the Mexicans.

To continue with the governor's report:

This population of Spanish or Mexican descent is well scattered throughout the Territory, but is rapidly assimilating with the newcomers—

He does not say that it has assimilated—from the States, especially in and around the towns and cities where the splendid public-school facilities are contributing much to the result.

As the public-school system in the Territory has been in vogue but twelve years, and as the average age of public-school children is about 11 years, it is not easy to account for this rapid assimilation through the public-school system.

The counties in which the "natives of the Territory" of Spanish or Mexican parentage are in excess are (and here I wish to call attention to their names) Bernalillo, Donna Ana, Guadalupe, Mora, Rio Arriba, Socorro, San Miguel, Santa Fe, Taos, Union, and Valencia; while in Lincoln, Colfax, Chaves, Eddy, Grant, Luna, McKinley, Otero, Sierra, and San Juan they are in the minority or are very evenly balanced. Now, I have made up a table from the figures given by the governor showing the power of the Spanish or Mexican element throughout the Territory:

Counties in which the natives of the Territory of Spanish or Mexican parentage are in excess.	Population.	Representation in legislature (house, 24).
Bernalillo	30,000	3
Dona Anna	11,000	2
Guadalupe	7,500	1
Mora	11,000	1
Rio Arriba	15,000	1
San Miguel	28,000	3
Santa Fe	19,000	2
Socorro	14,000	2
Taos	12,000	1
Union	7,700	1
Valencia	16,000	2
Total	171,200	19

In the other counties the governor says that the Spanish or Mexican descendants are in the minority or evenly balanced. Granting that they are in the minority, we have 11 counties out of 21 with a majority of Spanish or Mexican descendants and a representation in the lower house of the legislature of 19 to 5. Some of these districts include two counties, but the larger controls. As I have said before, the Mexican element is controlled by a few families of Spanish descent or Castilians, and from the above figures it can be seen that the Territorial government, if changed to statehood, would be in the hands of a few people whose ideas and general characteristics are un-American.

[At this point Mr. KEAN yielded to Mr. BEVERIDGE.]

Friday, February 6, 1903.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I had no idea, as I stated yesterday when I yielded the floor for a moment, that the debate would occupy the whole day. I will resume where I left off in comparing the density of population of the Territories proposed to be admitted as States with that of the other public-land States at the time of their admission to the Union, as shown by the census report nearest the date of their admission.

I have prepared a table showing the time of the establishment of Territorial government, the time of the establishment of State government, the number of years which elapsed between the establishment of the two forms of government in each State which has been admitted into the Union, and showing also the density of population at the time of the formation of State governments according to the nearest census, and the density of population ten years after the date when each State was admitted. It is rather an interesting subject, so I will read it.

Ohio, which was admitted to State government in 1802, had a density of population at the time of her admission of 1.1 to the square mile. In ten years the population had increased to 5.7 to the square mile.

Louisiana was given Territorial government in 1805 and admitted as a State in 1812, seven years having elapsed. At the first census after her admission she had a density of population of 1.7, and ten years later she had a population of 3.4.

Indiana was established as a Territory in 1800 and was made a State in 1816, sixteen years afterwards. She had when she was admitted to statehood a density of population of 0.7 to the square mile by the census of 1810, and in ten years the density of population had increased to 4.1.

Mississippi was established as a Territory in 1798 and admitted to State government in 1817, nineteen years after. She had when she was admitted a density of population of 1.6, according to the census of 1820, and ten years after she had nearly doubled her population, having in 1830 a density of 2.9.

Illinois was given Territorial government in 1809 and admitted into the Union as a State in 1818, nine years afterwards. By the census of 1820 her density of population was 1 to the square mile, and ten years later she had more than doubled it, having 2.8.

Alabama was made a Territory in 1817 and a State in 1819, only two years having elapsed. By the census of 1820 she had a density of population of 2.5, and ten years after she had grown wonderfully, and had a density of population of 6.

Missouri was made a Territory in 1812 and a State in 1821, after nine years had passed. She had, according to the census of 1820, a density of population of 1, and ten years after she had a density of population more than double, or 2.1.

Arkansas, which was organized as a Territory in 1819 and admitted as a State seventeen years after, or in 1836, had a density of population, according to the census of 1830, of 0.6, and ten years after had a density of population of 1.8.

Michigan, which was organized as a Territory in 1805 and admitted as a State in 1837, thirty-two years later, had a density of population by the census of 1830 of 0.2. By the census ten years later she had wonderfully increased, and had a population of 3.7.

Florida in 1822 was made a Territory, and in 1845 admitted as a State, twenty-three years having elapsed. By the census of 1840 she had a density of population of 1, and by the census ten years later she had a density of population of 1.6.

Iowa was established as a Territory in 1838, and eight years later, in 1846, was admitted into the Union as a State. By the census of 1840 she had a density of population of 0.2, and by the census ten years later she showed her eminent qualifications for statehood by having a density of population of 3.5.

Wisconsin was created a Territory in 1836 and admitted as a State twelve years afterwards, in 1848. She had a density of population, according to the census of 1850, of 5.6. Ten years later she had a density of population of 14.2, a marvelous increase.

California was admitted to the Union in 1850. According to her first census she had a density of population of 0.6, and ten years later had a density of population of 2.4.

Minnesota, which was made a Territory in 1849 and admitted as a State in 1858, nine years later, had a density of population, according to the census of 1860, of 2.2, which increased in the next ten years to 5.6.

Oregon, which was made a Territory in 1848 and admitted as a State in 1859, eleven years after, had a density of population, according to the census of 1860, of 0.6. In ten years the density of population had increased to 1.

Kansas in 1854 was made a Territory, and was admitted as a State in 1861, after a period of seven years. By the census of 1860 she had a density of population of 0.9, and by the census ten years later had a density of population of 4.5.

Nevada in 1861 was made a Territory and in 1864, three years later, was admitted as a State. In 1860 she had a density of population of 0.1, and ten years after the density of population had increased to 0.4.

Nebraska, made a Territory in 1854 and admitted as a State thirteen years later, or in 1867, had, according to the census of 1870, a density of population of 1.6, and according to the census ten years later had a density of population of 5.9 to the square mile.

Colorado was made a Territory in 1861, admitted in 1876, fifteen years afterwards; had a density of population by the census of 1880 of 1.9, and ten years after she had a density of population of 4. North Dakota was made a Territory in 1861 and South Dakota the same year; admitted as States in 1889, twenty-eight years after they were made Territories, and had a density of population, according to the census of 1890, the way they had divided it, of 2.7 in 1890 for North Dakota, and ten years thereafter it was 4.5. In South Dakota in 1890 it was 4.5 and ten years thereafter 5.2. Montana was made a Territory in 1864, was admitted as a State in 1889, twenty-five years after having been made a Territory; the density of population was 1 in 1890 and ten years thereafter 1.7. Washington was made a Territory in 1853, was admitted as a State in 1889, thirty-six years thereafter. In 1890 the density of population was 5.3 and ten years thereafter 7.7. Idaho was made a Territory in 1863, admitted as a State in 1890, having been a Territory twenty-seven years; the density of population was 1.1, and ten years thereafter was 1.9. Wyoming was made a Territory in 1868 and a State in 1890, twenty-two years having elapsed. It had a density of population of 0.6 and increased in ten years to 0.9. Utah was made a Territory in 1850 and a State in 1896, after forty-six years under Territorial government; the density of population was 2.6 according to the census of 1890, and 3.4 ten years after.

Now we come to Arizona and New Mexico. Arizona was made a Territory in 1863, New Mexico in 1850. Forty years after having been made a Territory, in New Mexico the density of population in 1890 was 1.3 and by the last census 1.6. Arizona, twenty-seven years after she was made a Territory, had a density of population of 0.8 in 1890 and 1.1 in 1900.

The population of New Mexico, according to the last census, has grown to a little over three times that which she had when she first became a Territory, in 1850. The total number of square miles of land surface in New Mexico is 122,460. The average number of persons to the square mile in 1890 was 1.3 and in 1900 1.6, an increase of 0.3 person to the square mile in ten years—a marvelous growth, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] says.

Notwithstanding the small population in the rural districts, there are only seven towns in the Territory which have more than 2,000 inhabitants.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from New Jersey permit me?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was reading day before yesterday the speech of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] when he was a Delegate in the House, in 1874, and was asking for the admission of New Mexico; and in 1874, nearly thirty years ago, he stated that the population of New Mexico was 135,000. If he was correct then, and who shall dispute that he was, there has been an increase since then of only about 60,000 in thirty years. I wondered whether the Senator's researches sustained that conclusion of the Senator from West Virginia. If they did, of course, it would show the largeness and importance of the growth of population and immigration down there since.

Mr. KEAN. I think the increase has been great since that time, but I doubt very much whether the Delegate from the Territory of New Mexico stated with great accuracy the population at that time. I think he was engaged, as a good many other people are, in booming the Territory, and probably they had a census made for the purpose of admission. I do not know; I have not looked at the figures lately, but I should say that the Senator did not leave out any of the population at that time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Delegate at that time in his speech was booming the Territory, attention should be called to the fact that it was on that speech that the bill passed the House at that time. So if that be true there was rather an unreliable basis for statehood then.

Mr. KEAN. I am sorry the Senator from West Virginia is not here, because I think his mind might be refreshed on the speech he made at that time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I join the Senator from New Jersey in that regret. I am always sorry when the Senator from West Virginia is absent.

Mr. KEAN. As I was saying, Mr. President, there are only seven towns in the Territory which have more than 2,000 inhabitants, and the largest is Albuquerque, with 6,238. While most of the counties have increased somewhat in population, four of them have actually decreased—Lincoln from 7,081 in 1890 to 4,935 in 1900; San Miguel from 24,204 in 1890 to 22,053 in 1900. Mora County has lost 300 and Sierra County about 500 in the same period.

Now let us look at the advantages the citizens of New Mexico have had according to the governor's report:

The material progress of New Mexico is not more marked than is its advantages along the path of morality. That a high standard of public morals prevails here is further shown by the very large number and character of religious organizations, and it is a fact not to be questioned that the percentage of regular churchgoers in New Mexico is far ahead of that of the average in the States.

The various church organizations are in charge of refined and cultivated men and are well represented. The following named churches are all well attended throughout the Territory in every county and city: Catholic, Episcopal, Methodist, Methodist Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal South, Presbyterian, Congregational, Christian, Baptist, Mormon, African Methodist, African Baptist, and others.

The Catholic Church has been in New Mexico so long that the governor can not even set the date when it came there. He simply says that it was the first to occupy the field.

"The first Protestant church to enter the Territory was the Baptist, in 1850." I imagine that there were no other churches except the Catholic Church in New Mexico before that time. Then came the Methodists, in 1851; the others followed some years after. With the same missionary spirit that the United States has developed and shown all over the world, religion spread to the new Territories very rapidly.

Next to the schools, says the governor, the immigrant inquires concerning the church facilities. With all of this refining influence, opportunity for education, for advancement, the percentage of illiterate persons in New Mexico over 10 years of age reaches the enormous figures of 33.2.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. MCCOMAS. The interesting statement made by the Senator from New Jersey suggests to me an inquiry with respect to that great Protestant body, the Baptists. I want to know if in that arid country there has been a rapid increase of that branch of the Baptist Church which believes in immersion?

Mr. KEAN. I am sorry that I could not find that in the census. The religious census for 1890 is the latest I have, and I can not give the Senator the exact number of Baptists there. I can give the number of Mormons.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator again give the figures with reference to illiteracy? The last the Senator gave was 33.2 per cent. Will the Senator give the whole of those figures?

Mr. KEAN. The percentage of illiterate persons in New Mexico?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes.

Mr. KEAN. Those over 10 years of age reached the enormous figure of 33.2 per cent.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is all of them?

Mr. KEAN. That is all.

The census for 1900 shows that—

The largest proportion of white persons of foreign parentage 10 years of age and over who can not speak English are found in New Mexico, Arizona, and Texas.

That is, comparing all of the United States.

In New Mexico those reported as unable to speak English constitute fully one-third (33.8) of all the white persons of foreign parentage 10 years of age or over, while in Arizona and Texas the percentages are very nearly as large. New Mexico has even a larger percentage of its native white population of Spanish descent who can not speak English. Such persons number 53,931 and constitute 51.1 per cent of all the native white persons of native parentage 10 years of age and upward in that Territory in 1900, as compared with 69.9 per cent in 1890.

So they had improved 8.8 per cent in ten years. This shows a woeful lack of intelligence in a people who have had the advantages of the educational and refining influence of the Catholic Church for generations, and of other denominations for over fifty years.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The 51 per cent, as I understand, is confined to those 10 years of age and over who are of native parentage; that is, it does not include any of the immigrants from any other place.

Mr. KEAN. That is correct.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So if to that were added all those who have come in from Mexico or any place else who can not speak English, the percentage would necessarily be very much larger.

Mr. KEAN. That is correct.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The 51 per cent of whom the Senator speaks, being confined to those of native-born parents who have lived there, is the minimum amount. That is the point I rather inferred from the Senator's remarks; and if so, I wanted to make it clear at least to my own mind.

Mr. KEAN. Let us look further into their enlightenment. Post-offices are always an indication of advancement and learning. Where they multiply rapidly one may at least be sure of finding a knowledge of writing. On January 1, 1903, there were but 373 post-offices of all classes in New Mexico. The total number of square miles is 122,580, which gives an average of 1 office to every 328 square miles of territory.

You can see that the Delegate does not have his hands very full in making post-office appointments, even though he does represent 122,580 square miles of territory.

Now, compare this with Mississippi—and I make no reflection upon that State, where the percentage of illiteracy is 32, owing to its large colored population—and we find there 2,155 post-offices; 46,810 square miles of territory, or 1 office to 21 square miles—a difference of 307 square miles; rather striking, to my mind. Or compare it to Pennsylvania, the State with the largest number of post-offices, 4,963, whose territory covers 45.215 square miles, and we have 1 office to every 10 square miles. Illiteracy in Pennsylvania in 1900 was 6.1 per cent. I suppose with the diligence that Pennsylvanians always exert in establishing offices, and especially post-offices, they will soon have 1 office to every 3 square miles.

The total postal receipts of New Mexico for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, were, in round numbers, $179,000, and the population, according to the governor's report, was 246,000, which would make an average expenditure per year of 72 cents per person. The total postal receipts of the United States for 1900 per capita, including Indians, were about $1.34, almost twice as much as that of New Mexico.

Now as to the growth of industries in New Mexico. The Senator from Ohio called attention to the rapid growth of internal-revenue receipts in New Mexico and Arizona. I find on consulting these figures that they are as follows:

1893	48,886.68
1894	36,720.56
1895	41,308.22
1896	36,404.43
1897	38,019.29

I call attention to the varying character of these figures. They are not steady. They are not stable. They do not increase with regularity. They decline. Then they come up again. They are fluctuating.

It will be noticed that the receipts actually decreased from 1892 to 1897, although in 1893 and 1895 the receipts did reach a higher figure than in 1892. In 1898 the effect of the war tariff was felt and the figures took a jump.

1898	$51,733.83
1900	131,256.67
1901	120,308.27

It will be noticed again that the receipts were the largest in 1899, when the full effect of the war tariff was felt, and that they diminished year after year until the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, when they amounted to but $76,720.18.

Of this amount, $37,847.80 was collected in New Mexico. I suppose Arizona and New Mexico are one revenue district, and therefore these figures are put together by the Internal-Revenue Office.

All statistical reports I have consulted show that the population of Arizona and New Mexico have only awakened in the past few years from a state of lethargy. For forty years these Territories made but little progress—mining and cattle raising being the principal industries; agriculture cut but a small figure, and was indulged in by a few Mexicans who had small farms or ranches along the two rivers in the Territory. Some years the farmers are prosperous, but often the crops are wiped out by the sudden floods which come down the rivers without warning, and many of the inhabitants have been reduced to such poverty by these inundations that they were on the verge of starvation. Whole sections of so-called farms along the rivers have been flooded in a few hours and made absolutely useless for months. No population but Mexicans could stand or tolerate these conditions; they can live on as near nothing as a Chinaman. A few mesquite beans and a little bacon fat will keep them alive. A goat will not eat mesquite beans if it can find anything else.

During the past ten years immigrants have arrived in the Territory, and the farming industry is assuming larger proportions. If this Territory progresses in the future as it has in the past ten years, it will be entitled to statehood ten years from now, but at the present time the population is too illiterate, un-American, and fluctuating for the proposition to be considered.

I will leave the Territory of New Mexico for the present and take up Arizona. In the Territory of Arizona the population is but a little more intelligent than in New Mexico. The illiteracy there, as shown by the last census, is 29 per cent, but the Mexican population is not so large. The number of post-offices there in January, 1903, was 248, and the area of the Territory is 113,020 square miles, which is equivalent to 1 office to every 455 square miles. The total postal receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, were $179,231, and the population in 1900 was 122,931, which gives an average expenditure per capita of $1.46. This average is higher than New Mexico, although the number of post-offices in Arizona is much less and the area they cover is much greater. However, the percentage of illiteracy in Arizona is but 29 to 33.2 in New Mexico, which supports my statement that post-office receipts are an indication of the intellectual condition of the people inhabiting the State or Territory.

The existence of a large number of Mormons in the Territory of Arizona has given rise to considerable uneasiness on the part of many of my constituents and also the citizens of other States. I have received hundreds of petitions in regard to this subject, asking me to vote in favor of an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting polygamy. How much more are these people against admitting to statehood a Territory in which Mormonism already has a strong and growing hold—a Territory in which the Mormons now hold the balance of power, and if they increase in the future as they have in the past they will soon be the power.

[At this point Mr. KEAN yielded the floor for the day.]

Saturday, February 7, 1903.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, when interrupted yesterday I was speaking of Mormonism, and I shall now begin where I then left off.

I have nothing to say against the Mormon as an agriculturist, he is one of the best; as a citizen, he is sober and industrious; but it is the degrading practice of polygamy and the power of the church in politics to which I object. How can I support a bill in which these questions are treated with so little weight? The act says:

> First. That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship: Provided, That polygamous or plural marriages are forever prohibited.

This only prohibits polygamous or plural marriages. It does not say that they shall not be tolerated or recognized if made in other countries or States. It does not prohibit the continuation of polygamic cohabitation in marriages that have already taken place. It has not the force and effect of the so-called Edmunds Act.

I am not opposed to any creed or any church if that creed or church is not opposed to the Constitution of the United States and our form of government. I shall quote here from an editorial which I saw in a recent issue of the Northwestern Christian Advocate:

> The history of the Mormon Church shows it to have been a law-defying, even murderous, organization, so far as its leadership is concerned, the common members being simply the ignorant tools of the leaders. There is little doubt that the rank and file of the church rebel in their hearts against many things which have been required of them in the past by the leaders, and they would be compelled to openly practice polygamy to-day and commit crimes against the laws and against society but for fear of the Federal Government. Their loyalty to the memory of Brigham Young is evidence that in their hearts the leaders, at least, are disloyal to the Government. Brigham Young said in a public meeting in the tabernacle in Salt Lake City in 1872: "I have chosen Brother Cannon to represent us in Congress, because I mean to cram polygamy down the throats of the American people." George Q. Cannon, who was thus sent to Congress by Brigham Young, in a speech delivered in the presence of 10,000 people in the same tabernacle in 1881, said: "The Government of the United States will be powerless in the future, as it has been in the past, to enforce the antipolygamy or any other law detrimental to the interests or the progress of the Kingdom of God on earth. Nineteen years ago, on the 2d of last July, the Congress of the United States passed a law to prohibit polygamy in the Territory. How much prohibition has the law effected? How many of us have been punished for the practice of polygamy?"
> Hon. P. T. Van Zile, attorney-general of Utah, declared: "The ruling party here not only violates the solemn mandates of the United States Government, but they openly and publicly defy the Government and its officers to enforce the laws." It is a well-known fact that the Mormon priesthood for years has set at defiance the national authority and has killed or driven out of the Territory many of the United States governors, judges, and other officers. President Garfield, in his inaugural, said: "It is a reproach to our Government that, in the most populous of the Territories, the authority of Congress is set at naught." The attitude of the Mormon Church was thus described by Schuyler Colfax, Speaker of the House of Representatives and Vice-President: "A barbaric institution which degrades women, defies our national law, scouts at our national judiciary, mocks at our national authority, stains our national escutcheons, and reviles all who lift their voices against it." President Taylor of the Mormon Church said: "Let the Government so much as lay its finger upon us and we will show the people of the United States what we can do." Brigham Young, jr., one of the twelve apostles, said: "What do we care for the Government of the United States? As far as I am concerned, I have had enough of this thing." There has been no change of heart among the Mormons. They believe as they did when these defiant words were uttered.
> Mormonism is for the present simply silent, awaiting an opportunity when it may have power to control the legislation of the Government in its own interests. It is spreading into the States and Territories of the Far West and hopes in time to be able to control these. For this reason, if for no other, Arizona and New Mexico should not be admitted at present into the Union as States. The admission of Utah before an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting polygamy or plural marriage in any form had been adopted was a mistake. To increase the political power of the Mormons by the admission of new States which they control will give life to the viper which will strike at the heart of the American home and of the nation. (Northwestern Christian Advocate, January 28, 1903.)

Mr. President, in my opinion, every word of that editorial is true. Polygamy is practiced to-day, but in countries where the law is more lenient. Let me read from the Mormon Book of Doctrine and Covenants. First, I will quote from the Articles of Faith of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints; but instead of reading all of them I will read but a few, and ask that the rest be printed as part of my remarks.

Section 9 reads:

We believe all that God has revealed, all that He does now reveal, and we believe that He will yet reveal many great and important things pertaining to the Kingdom of God.

Section 132 is a "Revelation on the eternity of the marriage covenant, including plurality of wives. Given through Joseph the Seer, in Nauvoo, Hancock County, Ill., July 12, 1843." I will insert portions of this section in my remarks, as I do not care to read it all at the present time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

REVELATION ON THE ETERNITY OF THE MARRIAGE COVENANT, INCLUDING PLURALITY OF WIVES—GIVEN THROUGH JOSEPH THE SEER, IN NAUVOO, HANCOCK COUNTY, ILL., JULY 12, 1843.

1. Verily, thus saith the Lord unto you, my servant Joseph, that inasmuch as you have inquired of my hand, to know and understand wherein I, the Lord, justified my servants Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; as also Moses, David, and Solomon, my servants, as touching the principle and doctrine of their having many wives and concubines.

2. Behold and lo! I am the Lord thy God, and will answer thee as touching this matter.

3. Therefore, prepare thy heart to receive and obey the instructions which I am about to give unto you; for all those who have this law revealed unto them must obey the same.

4. For behold! I reveal unto you a new and everlasting covenant; and if ye abide not that covenant, then are ye damned; for no one can reject this covenant and be permitted to enter into my glory.

5. For all who will have a blessing at my hands shall abide the law which was appointed for that blessing, and the conditions thereof, as were instituted from before the foundation of the world.

6. And as pertaining to the new and everlasting covenant, it was instituted for the fullness of my glory; and he that receiveth a fullness thereof must and shall abide the law, or he shall be damned, saith the Lord God.

* * * * * * *

61. And again, as pertaining to the law of the priesthood: If any man espouse a virgin, and desire to espouse another, and the first give her consent; and if he espouse the second, and they are virgins, and have vowed to no other man, then is he justified; he can not commit adultery, for they are given unto him; for he can not commit adultery with that that belongeth unto him and to no one else.

62. And if he have ten virgins given unto him by this law, he can not commit adultery, for they belong to him, and they are given unto him; therefore is he justified.

63. But if one or either of the ten virgins, after she is espoused, shall be with another man, she has committed adultery, and shall be destroyed; for they are given unto him to multiply and replenish the earth, according to my commandment, and to fulfill the promise which was given by my Father before the foundation of the world; and for their exaltation in the eternal worlds, that they may bear the souls of men; for herein is the work of my Father continued, that he may be glorified.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, this is still the belief, though it may not be the practice, of the people residing in Utah. In 1890 the head of the Mormon Church in "anguish and prayer cried to God for help for his flock and received the permission to advise the members of the Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter-Day Saints that the law commanding polygamy was henceforth suspended."

I call the attention of the Senate to the mild words. They suspended the law by revelation. I have looked carefully through their Book of Doctrine and Covenants, but I can not find that this revelation has ever been published in it. It is one of those that never has been published. It was only suspended.

This book was published in 1901 and there is an appendix attached to it, but I can not find that they even thought it worth while to publish the fact that it had been suspended.

This octopus of the Mormon Church, with its head safely established in the State of Utah, is spreading its many arms throughout the United States.

I have here a little leaflet issued from Salt Lake City in 1902, called "The Latter-Day Saints—Their Religion, History, Condition, and Destiny." I will read a few paragraphs from this little book to show how Mormonism is going on in these days. I read from page 59, relating to present conditions.

PRESENT CONDITION.

The results of the industry, integrity, and thrift of the Saints, as shown by their present condition, are a complete refutation of the accusations of evil made against them. A corrupt tree can not bring forth good fruit. Utah, the chief center of their gathering place, has a population of 270,000, 75 per cent being "Mormons." Ninety per cent of the heads of families live in their own houses and on their own lands. The fruitful orchards, rich fields and farms, successful industries, and beautiful cities, towns, and villages, present to the view a paradise upon earth; while the vigor and cheerfulness of old and middle-aged and young betoken the health, prosperity, and happiness which are God's own gifts to this people, in whose hearts dwells more abundantly than in those of any other community that love of God and of their fellow-men which is the fruit of a pure and noble life in the service of the great Creator.

I desire to call especial attention to this paragraph:

Not alone in Utah do the Latter-Day Saints find a home. Their hundreds of settlements bedeck the mountain valleys from the Province of Alberta, in Canada, through Montana, Oregon, Idaho, Nevada, Wyoming, Utah, Colorado, Arizona, and New Mexico, in the United States, to Chihuahua, in old Mexico, on either side of a line which reaches 1,500 miles along the backbone of the American continent.

So it will be seen, Mr. President, that in this little leaflet they put out a claim that they are now covering the backbone of the American continent for more than 1,500 miles and extended into Mexico when driven out of the United States. Are we to allow this evil to grow among us? Are we to admit to statehood Territories without first assuring ourselves that the practice of polygamy and domination of church influences in politics can not live there? I do not think there would be any doubt whatever as to their answer if this subject were submitted to the American people.

During this session of Congress many petitions have been presented here by me and by other Senators, which we have had referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, asking for a constitutional amendment to strengthen the law against polygamy. Knowing those petitions to exist and knowing in a great many instances the people from whom they come, I could not be silent and refrain from urging some more stringent measure being put in this bill than the words it now contains.

The petitions that have been presented here asking for an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy read as follows:

We, the undersigned, legally qualified voters (or women citizens) of the State of New Jersey, do hereby petition you to use your best endeavors to secure prompt action in the Fifty-seventh Congress, proposing an amendment to the National Constitution and submitting the same to the legislatures of the several States, defining legal marriage to be monogamic, and making polygamy and polygamous cohabitation, under whatsoever guise or pretense, a crime against the United States, punishable by severe penalties, including disfranchisement and disqualification to vote or hold any office of honor or emolument under the United States or any State or Territory thereof.

I believe that nearly every member of this body has received similar petitions. I feel sure that every man and woman of my State who signed these petitions, and every other person, would oppose the admission of these Territories if they knew that polygamy was not to be stamped out before they became part of the Union. Yes, Mr. President, not only the citizens of New Jersey, but the citizens of these United States, are interested in this matter. This question has not been brought to them as it should have been. Each day brings out some new feature in this bill which the public knows nothing about. We want to discuss this matter; we want the people to know what we are doing, and we want them to know why we are opposing this omnibus statehood bill.

I will call attention to the legislation that has been enacted by Congress to crush out polygamy in this country, and I will then try to show what effect it has had upon this practice, so as to demonstrate the necessity for further legislation.

The first legislation upon this subject was enacted in July, 1862, and is contained in the Revised Statutes, section 5352. This section provided:

Every person having a husband or wife living, who marries another, whether married or single, in a Territory, or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, is guilty of bigamy, and shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500, and by imprisonment for a term of not more than five years; but this section shall not extend to any person by reason of any former marriage whose husband or wife by such marriage is absent for five successive years, and is not known to such person to be living; nor to any person by reason of any former marriage which has been dissolved by decree of a competent court; nor to any person by reason of any former marriage which has been pronounced void by decree of a competent court on the ground of nullity of the marriage contract.

This is the law of which George Q. Cannon spoke in his speech in Salt Lake, when he said, among other things:

Nineteen years ago on the 2d of last July the Congress of the United States passed a law to prohibit polygamy in the Territory. How much prohibition has that law effected? How many of us have been punished for the practice of polygamy?

These are the words used by the man Brigham Young selected to represent the Territory of Utah in the halls of Congress, the man whom he sent here "to cram polygamy down the throats of the American people."

Mr. President, after trying for years to enforce this law in the Territories, meeting with failure at almost every attempt to convict under it, the Congress of the United States passed an act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes, on March 22, 1882. This act was made as strict and specific as possible. It covered every subject of Mormonism, even going so far as to try and break up their organization, and yet it was not successful, and the practice of polygamy was not stopped, for in 1887 another act amending the act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes was passed—a law which we all know, commonly called the Edmunds Act.

The provisions of that law at least ought to be extended to the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona before they are admitted as States.

Mr. President, the United States tried in every way possible to suppress polygamy in its Territories. It passed three laws upon the subject, each successive one being stronger and more specific than the other; the legislatures of several of the Territories enacted laws which even went so far as to disfranchise any person professing the Mormon religion; Congress authorized the appointment of a commission—the Utah Commission—to supervise the elections, and to report the condition of the Territory of Utah to the Secretary of the Interior, which it did to the best of its ability. But, Mr. President, it was not until Utah came before Congress with its request to be admitted as a State that the Mormons discovered that unless they took some action in regard to polygamy she would never be admitted. It was then and not before that a revelation from God suspended the practice of polygamy.

I will read from the report made from the Committee on Territories by Mr. Kilgore, who was a member of the House from Texas. I had the pleasure of serving with him in the House. He submitted a report, from which I read the following:

Mr. Kilgore, from the Committee on the Territories, submitted the following report, to accompany H. R. 352:

Your committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 352) entitled "A bill to enable the people of Utah to form a constitution and State government, and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," have had the same under consideration and respectfully report as follows:

On January 4, 1893, President Harrison issued the following:

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas Congress, by a statute approved March 22, 1882, and by statutes in furtherance and amendment thereof, defined the crimes of bigamy, polygamy, and unlawful cohabitation in the Territories and other places within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, and prescribed a penalty for such crimes; and

Whereas on or about the 6th day of October, 1890, the Church of the Latter-Day Saints, commonly known as the Mormon Church, through its president, issued a manifesto proclaiming the purpose of said church no longer to sanction the practice of polygamous marriages, and calling upon all members and adherents of said church to obey the laws of the United States in reference to said subject-matter; and

Whereas it is represented that since the date of said declaration the members and adherents of said church have generally obeyed said laws and have abstained from plural marriages and polygamous cohabitation; and

Whereas by a petition dated December 19, 1891, the officials of said church, pledging the membership thereof to a faithful obedience to the laws against plural marriages and unlawful cohabitation, have applied to me to grant amnesty for past offenses against said laws, which requests a very large number of influential non-Mormons residing in the Territories have also strongly urged; and

Whereas the Utah Commission, in their report bearing date September 15, 1892, recommend that said petition be granted and said amnesty proclaimed, under proper conditions as to the future observance of the law, with a view to the encouragement of those now disposed to become law-abiding citizens; and

Whereas during the past two years such amnesty has been granted to individual applicants in a very large number of cases, conditioned upon the faithful observance of the laws of the United States against unlawful cohabitation, and there are now pending many more such applications: Now,

Therefore I, Benjamin Harrison, President of the United States, by virtue of the powers in me vested, do hereby declare and grant a full amnesty and pardon to all persons liable to the penalties of said act by reason of unlawful cohabitation under the color of polygamous or plural marriage, who have since November 1, 1890, abstained from such unlawful cohabitation; but on the express condition that they shall in future faithfully obey the laws of the United States hereinbefore named, and not otherwise.

Those who shall fail to avail themselves of the clemency hereby offered will be vigorously prosecuted.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this fourth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-three, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and seventeenth.

[SEAL.] BENJAMIN HARRISON.

By the President:

JOHN W. FOSTER, Secretary of State.

DISCONTINUANCE OF POLYGAMY.

The manifesto referred to by the President in his amnesty proclamation was issued by the president of the Mormon Church on September 25, 1890. This is the manifesto:

To whom it may concern:

Press dispatches having been sent for political purposes from Salt Lake City, which have been widely published, to the effect that the Utah Commission, in their recent report to the Secretary of the Interior, allege that plural marriages are still being solemnized, and that forty or more such marriages have been contracted in Utah since last June or during the past year; also that in public discourses the leaders of the church have taught, encouraged, and urged the continuance of the practice of polygamy.

I, therefore, as president of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, do hereby, in the most solemn manner, declare that these charges are false. We are not teaching polygamy, or plural marriage, nor permitting any person to enter into its practice, and I deny that either forty or any number of plural marriages have during that period been solemnized in our temples or in any other place in the Territory.

One case has been reported in which the parties alleged that the marriage was performed in the endowment house, in Salt Lake City, in the spring of 1889, but I have not been able to learn who performed the ceremony. Whatever was done in the matter was without my knowledge. In consequence of this alleged occurrence the endowment house was, by my instructions, taken down without delay.

Inasmuch as laws have been enacted by Congress forbidding plural marriages, which laws have been pronounced constitutional by the court of last resort, I hereby declare my intention to submit to those laws and to use my influence with the members of the church over which I preside to have them do likewise.

There is nothing in my teachings to the church or in those of my associates, during the time specified, which can be reasonably construed to inculcate or encourage polygamy, and when any elder of the church has used language which appeared to convey any such teaching he has been promptly reproved, and I now publicly declare that my advice to the Latter-Day Saints is to refrain from contracting any marriage forbidden by the laws of the land.

WILFORD WOODRUFF,
President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints.

On the 6th day of October, 1890, eleven days after the manifesto was issued, the church met in general conference. It is estimated that from ten to fifteen thousand people were present. Every quorum and council of the church, from the first presidency and twelve apostles down to the least authority in the church, were represented. There were officers and members present from every stake in Utah, and from all the country round about. This manifesto was read to that assembly, and Lorenzo Snow, the president of the council of apostles, the next highest authority in the church to the first presidency, made the following motion, which was unanimously adopted:

"I move that, recognizing Wilford Woodruff as the president of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, and the only man on the earth at the present time who holds the keys of the sealing ordinances, we consider him fully authorized by virtue of his position to issue the manifesto which has been read in our hearing and which is dated September 25, 1890, and that as a church in general conference assembled we accept his declaration concerning plural marriage as authoritative and binding."

Referring to this manifesto in his message to the Secretary of the Interior for the year 1891, the governor of Utah says:

"I have no doubt that, as they have been led to believe it was put forth by Divine sanction, it will be received by the members of the Mormon Church as an authoritative rule of conduct, and that, in effect, the practice of polygamy is formally renounced by the people."

One year after, the church spoke again on this important subject. On October 6, 1891, the first presidency of the church made the following official declaration to the conference, which was unanimously indorsed by the vast assemblage present:

"Concerning the official report of the Utah Commission made to the Secretary of the Interior, in which they allege, 'During the past year, notwithstanding the "manifesto," reports have been received by the Commission of 18 male persons who, with an equal number of females, are believed to have entered into polygamous marriages' during the year, we have to say it is utterly without foundation in truth. We repeat in the most solemn manner the declaration made by President Wilford Woodruff at our general conference held last October, that there have been no plural marriages solemnized during the period named.

"Polygamy or plural marriage has not been taught, neither has there been given permission to any person to enter into its practice, but, on the contrary, it has been strictly forbidden.

"WILFORD WOODRUFF,
"GEORGE Q. CANNON,
"JOSEPH F. SMITH,
"First Presidency of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints."

Then came the petition for amnesty, from which I will read:

SALT LAKE CITY, December 19, 1891.

To the PRESIDENT:

We, the first presidency and apostles of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, beg respectfully to represent to your excellency the following facts:

We formerly taught to our people that polygamy, or celestial marriage, as commanded by God through Joseph Smith, was right; that it was a necessity to man's highest exaltation in the life to come.

That doctrine was publicly promulgated by our president, the late Brigham Young, forty years ago, and was steadily taught and impressed upon the Latter-Day Saints up to a short time before September, 1890. Our people are devout and sincere, and they accepted the doctrine, and many personally embraced and practiced polygamy.

When the Government sought to stamp the practice out, our people almost without exception remained firm, for they, while having no desire to oppose the Government in anything, still felt that their lives and their honor as men were pledged to a vindication of their faith, and that their duty toward those whose lives were a part of their own was a paramount one, to fulfill which they had no right to count anything, not even their own lives, as standing in the way. Following this conviction, hundreds endured arrest, trial, fine, and imprisonment, and the immeasurable suffering borne by the faithful people no language can describe. That suffering, in abated form, still continues.

More, the Government added disfranchisement to its other punishments for those who clung to their faith and fulfilled its covenants.

According to our faith the head of our church receives from time to time revelations for the religious guidance of his people.

In September, 1890, the present head of the church, in anguish and prayer, cried to God for help for his flock, and received the permission to advise the members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints that the law commanding polygamy was henceforth suspended.

That is all I will read at the present time.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the date of that report?

Mr. KEAN. It is the report made by Mr. Kilgore on the bill to admit the Territory of Utah as a State, and the date of this petition is December 19, 1891, when they had a vision to suspend polygamy so that they could be admitted into the Union as a State. I said—I do not know that the Senator from Wisconsin was present at the time—that I looked all through the Book of Doctrine and Covenants of the Mormon Church, published in 1900, with an appendix attached thereto, but I failed to find that they have put this decree suspending polygamy in it.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] have both told us of the influence of the Mormon Church in politics even now. The Senator from Idaho said that "if the Mormon people should flagrantly, through their first presidency—those who have authority—openly interfere in politics in Idaho, I would guarantee to take the stump in that State and disfranchise every Mormon in one campaign." Of course this is possible where the Mormons are not in power, but it would be absolutely impossible to do it if they were in the majority.

Mr. President, before Utah was admitted as a State it presented to Congress a constitution in which were strict provisions against bigamy and polygamy. I will read that section of the constitution. It is as follows:

SEC. 12. Bigamy and polygamy being considered incompatible with "a republican form of government"— each of them is hereby forbidden and declared a misdemeanor.

Any person who shall violate this section shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 and imprisonment for a term not less than six months, nor more than three years, in the discretion of the court. This section shall be construed as operative without the aid of legislation, and the offenses prohibited by this section shall not be barred by any statute of limitation within three years after the commission of the offense; nor shall the power of pardon extend thereto until such pardon shall be approved by the President of the United States.

Thus the power to change this clause and the power to pardon were taken out of the hands of the officers to be elected by the Mormon Church. Even after the enabling act passed the House, the Mormons of the legislature tried to change the election laws, but the act was vetoed by the governor.

I will read now in support of what I have said from the report of the Utah Commission, found in House Executive Document 1894-95, volume 16, page 479.

CHANGE IN ELECTION LAWS—ATTEMPTED.

During the session of the legislative assembly which convened on the 8th day of January, 1894, a bill was introduced providing for an act to restore the control of elections to the county courts of the several counties throughout the Territory, and which, in effect, would have repealed section 9 of the act of March 22, 1882, except as to the qualifications of voters and officeholders, and in addition thereto to impose upon the assessors of each county the duties of registration officers, and gave to the county courts the power to appoint all judges for general and special elections.

The above bill passed both branches of the legislature, but was vetoed by the governor, who, in returning the measure unsigned, submitted the following communication:

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

SIR: I herewith return without approval the bill for an act to restore the control of elections to the respective county courts of Utah (H. R. No. 34, by Mr. Allen), deeming it an ill-advised attempt to revise and alter Congressional legislation. By the Edmunds Act Congress disqualified a certain class of persons from voting. These disqualifications can only be removed by Congress, and this act can not take effect unless approved by Congress. In the enabling act for the admission of Utah, which has already passed the House of Representatives and is now pending in the Senate, with promise of early consideration, Congress recognizes the changed conditions existing in the Territory and, in effect, removes the disqualifications imposed by the Edmunds Act. I do not think it wise, after favorable action by one branch of Congress upon this important subject, to submit the present bill and thus afford an opportunity, if not an invitation, for the reconsideration of what has already been done toward restoring the franchise to persons now disqualified, besides causing delay, and perhaps imperil the enabling act. It could not hasten the desired consummation, and might retard statehood. While it is desirable to place the control of elections in the hands of the people, it is certainly more desirable to remove from a large class of our citizens the disqualifications that are now not only unnecessary but unjust, and we can not afford to jeopardize our chances of getting the greater boon in the hope of obtaining the lesser, which will swiftly follow the enabling act. Besides, we are assured that the present system will be administered during its future brief existence by bona fide citizens of our Territory.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

CALEB W. WEST, Governor.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Salt Lake City, March 8, 1894.

Mr. President, I can not find that the proposed constitution of Arizona contains any such clause as that of Utah. The present laws on her statutes in regard to polygamy, other than the application of the United States laws, are not at all severe. In fact they are practically the same as section 5352 of the Revised Statutes which the Mormons defied with impunity.

I will now read from the report of the Utah Commission their recommendation in regard to a constitutional amendment with respect to polygamy. Those Commissioners, I suppose, knew more about this general question than anyone else, with the possible exception of the Senators from Idaho and Utah. They had it under consideration at that time, and I think they were amply able to judge. And yet after the passage of all the laws trying to suppress polygamy, after exercising the powers given to them, and after stating that they believed that polygamy had practically ceased to exist in Utah, they advised an amendment to the Constitution as a remedy for the future troubles that might arise. I will read that part of the report. It is found in House Executive Document, 1893-94, volume 15, page 416.

POLYGAMY.

The early and continued disfavor incurred by the Mormons in Utah arose from their profession and defense of plural marriage as a cherished tenet of their religious and social system. From 1847 to July 1, 1862, such marriages were contracted in increasing numbers and with impunity. The Poland Act of 1862—

Which is the one I referred to before—denounced polygamy as a crime punishable with fine and imprisonment, but for fourteen years after the date of that act no conviction was had under it. This failure of criminal justice was attributable to several causes—to altercations respecting the boundaries of the spiritual and secular jurisdictions, to the unwillingness of the Mormons to convict or indict polygamists, and to the hesitation of the courts to reject jurors as triers of an issue regarding which their minds were affected by religious bias. It is enough to say in this connection that in 1878 the Supreme Court of the United States, in Reynolds v. The United States, swept away all of these hindrances in the courts of justice, and that Congress in 1882 and 1887 added another motive for obedience to the laws by providing that sexual offenders should be disqualified to vote, hold office, or perform jury service. This provision seems to have been intended to operate as an electoral regulation and not as a criminal penalty.

REFORM.

Important consequences followed this action of Congress and of the court of last resort. The spirit of reform was awakened, the laws were promptly and strictly enforced, and the test oath as a precedent condition to the exercise of the elective franchise was taken and subscribed by Mormons as well as non-Mormons. Later in 1887 the Mormon electors in the Territory framed, adopted, and proposed a constitution for Utah as a State, containing provisions, irrevocable without the consent of Congress, penally prohibiting sexual offenses and negativing the pardon of sexual offenders without the approval of the President.

In 1890 the Mormon Church, through its president, Wilford Woodruff, declared its opposition to further plural marriages and advised obedience to the laws forbidding them. In 1891 the People's or Mormon party of Utah dissolved its political organization in contemplation of a reconstruction of political parties in the Territory upon a wider and more liberal basis; and in 1892 the legislative assembly passed an act adopting the provisions of the Edmunds law and Edmunds-Tucker law, respectively, denouncing and punishing polygamy as a crime and recognizing the original exclusive jurisdiction of the district courts in the Territory (created by Congress) to hear and determine all such cases arising under that act.

THE UTAH COMMISSION.

The Utah Commission was organized under the Edmunds law of 1892 as one of the agents to be employed for the suppression of an obstinate social evil. The members of the Commission were, in the first instance, appointed by President Arthur from different political parties, conformably to that law, and, at the same time, from as many as five States, for the reason, as assigned, that such persons would be unlikely to be biased by the dissensions which had so long disturbed the Territory. This precedent, set by President Arthur, has hitherto been substantially followed by his successors.

For more than twenty-five years Mormon polygamy evinced neither disposition nor ability to redeem itself. Indeed, for more than half that period it was defiant of the law. It had confounded the temporal with the spiritual authority and had become arbitrary and dogmatic. Withal, it was defended and attacked by implacable local factions, whose intolerance served alike to inflame passion and warp discretion. It was between these factions, this Scylla and Charybdis, that the Edmunds law projected the Commission, somewhat, as a forlorn hope, to sink or swim, as it might happen.

Early after the organization of the Commission its members were met by leading local journals with scant and frigid courtesy. They were welcomed as sojourners for a term of rest and recreation, of wonderment at the charms of Salt Lake City and its surroundings. But the welcome sensibly implied that the commissioners, as intruders and supernumeraries, should early renounce their mission and return to their distant homes in the States.

In the meantime a few Mormons, professing extreme unction and intermitting briefly their resentment toward Congress, discharged a volley of lawsuits at the commissioners, charging them with unlawfully obstructing the right of registration and of voting. Upon the final hearing the Supreme Court of the United States adjudged the suits to be groundless and the plaintiffs to pay the costs attending them.

Next, an effort was made by a few Gentiles to procure a law substituting a legislative commission invested with proconsular powers, and appointive by the President and Senate, for the Utah Commission; but this scheme, being despotic and un-American, failed, as also did the kindred scheme to disfranchise the Mormons en masse for their membership in the Mormon Church.

So it transpired that the local factions, when not wholly engrossed in fighting each other, turned their attacks alternately or simultaneously against the Utah Commission. Thus the Commission was made representatively responsible for laws in the enactment or judicial construction of which it had no part. Under changing conditions, however, these obstacles are passing away.

Early in 1891 the Mormon or People's Party, formally and absolutely dissolved its organization. Soon after the Gentile faction informally and partially followed this example. The event was a triumph of progress. It furnished the material out of which the new parties in the Territory, Democratic and Republican, were formed, and which must, in the early future, absorb the remains of the Gentile faction. The new parties, leaving the dead past to bury its dead, are now competing with one another for the palm of local political ascendency. Each is asking Congress for radical legislation, i. e., for Territorial home rule or statehood, but notably neither is asking by either of those measures during their pendency the discontinuance of the Utah Commission.

The ninth section of the Edmunds law creates the office occupied by the Utah Commission, and provides, as has been seen, that the Commission shall consist of five members, not more than three of whom shall be of one political party and a majority of whom shall be a quorum. The same section, adopting portions of the Territorial law, devolves on the Commission the task of considering in pari materia the germane provisions of each of those laws and of deducing from them a consistent and effective system. Such a system is now in operation. It contemplates a multifarious service annually; a house to house inquiry, with a view to an annual revision of the electoral registry by adding to or striking names from it; the enforcement of the conditions of registration as affecting voters; the act of registration; the hearing of objections to the right of any person to have his name retained on the registry; the certification of the names adjudged to be wrongfully on the registry to the proper election judges; the transmission of the revised registry, with the attending affidavits of electoral qualification, to the county clerk for preservation, subject, however, to proper public and private inspection; the transmission of copies of registries to the presiding judges of elections; the publication of other copies with lists of the offices to be filled by election; the canvass of election returns; the issuing of certificates of election to persons elect, and the appointment of numerous official agents by the Commission, as provided by law, to carry into effect this varied, delicate, and responsible service.

Geographically this service measures the rugged mountainous length and breadth of Utah, 320 miles north and south by 300 miles east and west.

The number of officers appointed by the Commission since the date of its annual report, including those remaining to be appointed with reference to the approaching November election, is 2,667.

This agency, founded on brief words of the Edmunds law, and being a growth of less than twelve years in the hands of the Utah Commission, has in the meantime withstood the shifting storms of passion and prejudice. In the meantime factions have been disbanded, the laws enforced, progress accelerated, and the morality of monogamy vindicated:

In truth, the office of the Commissioners has not been a sinecure. They have had much to think of, often difficult legal questions to solve, many advisory opinions and administrative forms to prepare and circulate, multitudinous inquiries to answer, occasional journeys to make to different places in the Territory to observe the manner and course of official procedure, and withal other offices and functions unattended with any pecuniary recompense have been added to their trust. Briefly, the commissioners have spent in coming and going, in office work, and in preparing their reports to the Government nearly six months in every year since the date of the Commission's organization.

As to the constitutional amendment they say:

In contemplation of the turmoil and trouble born of polygamy, of the uncertainty and inconvenience arising from different State laws regulating marriage and divorce, and in contemplation of the importance of securing the future against the return of those evils, the Commission respectfully recommends that an amendment of the Federal Constitution be adopted, inhibiting polygamy and empowering Congress to prescribe the conditions of marriage and divorce and the manner and effect of authenticating each. The value of such an amendment as concerning the paramount feature of domestic and social life would be inestimable. It would draw under the exclusive cognizance of one legislature and one judiciary all questions affecting the conditions of marriage and divorce with the manner and effect of proving each. More, it would draw under the same cognizance, in a general sense, the distinction between monogamous and polygamous institutions, as importing either individual and national progress or individual and national apathy.

The amendment would inure as an authoritative notice to immigrants from every land that the United States are self-dedicated forever to the virtues of monogamy, and, not least, the amendment becoming a lesson in the common and higher schools of the States, would form and train the minds and morals of future generations in harmony with its spirit and reason.

I will not read further from that report.

Mr. President, it has been stated here and in reports from the States wherein Mormons reside that polygamy is no longer practiced. I know that these statements are made in good faith, but, Mr. President, I have grave doubts as to their absolute accuracy. It is my belief, as well as others, that it is but suspended, awaiting a time when it can again assert itself. It is now afraid, fearing the laws and power of the United States, but if we allow it to gain a foothold, if we give it hope, the time may come, not now, but years hence, when it will strike at the vitals of this Government, and strike with force.

Mr. President, at the time of the enforcement of the laws against polygamy, the so-called "persecution of the Mormons," a number of them emigrated to Mexico, where they established colonies, some on the lands they bought, others on land given by the Government, and in those colonies the practice of polygamy is in vogue to-day. I will read here an extract from a book or report which, I think, will be of interest.

I call the attention of the Senator from Colorado, whom I do not see here, to the translation from a book I have here, published in the German language.

[At this point Mr. KEAN yielded to Mr. CLAY for the passage of a bill.]

Mr. KEAN. The book is entitled "Mexico: Das Land und Seine Leute" (Mexico, the country and its people), by Henrich Lemcke, special commissioner of the Mexican Government, Ministry of Fomento (public works). It was published in Berlin, by the house of Alfred Schall, in 1900. In this book the author makes his acknowledgments in the preface of the official help of the Mexican Government in its preparation. It contains a chapter entitled "Eine Fahrt nach den Mormonen-Kolonien in Mexico" (A journey to the Mormon colonies of Mexico). In this it is stated that the Mormon Colony Dublan, in the State of Chihuahua, is 348 kilometers from El Paso (United States frontier). The author says:

As it was at the special desire of the President of the Republic (Mexico) that I visit the Mormon colonies, I was furnished with an official letter of introduction to the head of the colony. In the house of Mr. Pratt, the head of the colony of Dublan, I found a large family.

Mr. Pratt took the author to the colony of Juarez, 18 miles distant from Dublan, on which occasion Mr. Pratt said to him, "You must not be surprised if you see that we have more than one wife, and you will now become acquainted with another wife of mine, who will accompany us to Juarez."

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New Jersey when that book was published? Is it a recent publication?

Mr. KEAN. The book was published in 1900.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is a recent work?

Mr. KEAN. Yes, sir; a new work.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And it describes present conditions?

Mr. KEAN. Exactly so.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It does not describe past conditions?

Mr. KEAN. The author relates his experiences and his investigations of the tenets of Mormonism. He says the life of the Mormon is rigidly moral and devout.

If a Mormon has more than one wife they do not live together in one house, but each wife has her own house, wherein she dwells with her children.

He says further:

The Book of Mormonism allows polygamy, but not in the sense of immorality.

And further:

Mormonism is continually growing, and at present they have 1,400 missionaries in Europe.

According to nationality, they come from Scandinavia, Germany, Switzerland, England, and North America.

It must be looked upon as a great work of the Mexican Government.

I call the attention of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] to this passage:

It must be looked upon as a great work of the Mexican Government and demonstrates its tolerance, that about sixteen years ago they granted an asylum to Mormons driven out of the United States.

The above information can be obtained on pages 178 to 185 of the book if anyone cares to translate it. That, to my mind, Mr. President, is most conclusive as to the existence of polygamy in the Mormonism of the present day.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. KEAN. I do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It was stated here in debate the other day that polygamy is not now a tenet or practice of the Mormon Church, a subject upon which I am ignorant. I have not investigated the literature, but I understand that the authority which the Senator is now reading shows that that practice continues within the church, at least in Mexico. Do I understand the conclusion the Senator draws from that to be that it is not therefore eliminated from the church; that whether the practice exists in this country or not, it does exist in Mexico, and therefore is still within the church as an organization.

Mr. KEAN. That is exactly the truth.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is the conclusion the Senator draws, and, as the Senator says, it is the truth.

Mr. KEAN. It is the only conclusion which can be drawn from the fact.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think that is rather the most important——

Mr. KEAN. I will say further to the Senator from Indiana, there is no statute in Mexico that I can find which prohibits polygamy.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish, Mr. President, to call the attention of the Senators who participated in this debate the other day to it, and to say that this is, I think, the most important fact which has been brought out in connection with this subject.

I remember that I asked the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] the other day, he being familiar with and having fought a great fight on this subject out there, very much to his credit, whether or not there was anything in the statute books of New Mexico and Arizona against polygamy, and he stated that he did not know, but it was a matter of no consequence anyway.

Mr. KEAN. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that there is nothing in the statute books of either Arizona or New Mexico on that subject except what I have stated.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There is not such a provision, notwithstanding the large Mormon population in those Territories?

Mr. KEAN. I have so stated.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I must have been out of the Chamber at the time.

The Senator from Idaho made a statement the other day, which we all accepted, that it was immaterial what was in this law or what was on the statute books, because the practice of polygamy had been eliminated from the church. I say that that was generally accepted as correct. Now, the Senator from New Jersey has brought out the very seriously important fact that, however much it may be eliminated in Utah or any other place in this country, it does exist within the church in Mexico; and so it has not been abolished as a practice of the church. The Senator from New Jersey has just read some authorities here which show that within the church the practice does exist in Mexico itself, and that the Mormon Church has 1,400 missionaries in Europe sending to Mexico people who are members of that church.

I say, that being so, we all the other day accepted the statement of the Senator from Idaho that the practice had been eliminated, no matter what eliminated it; and, therefore, it was not important what provision was in this bill or in any other bill. I was told, in answer to a question of mine as to whether there was any law on the statute books of Arizona or New Mexico against this practice, that it did not exist any longer and had been abolished within the church. Now, the Senator from New Jersey has just read, while the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] were out of the Chamber, some very remarkable statements from an authoritative source, and, as he said, from a very recent book, which show that, whether the practice exists in this country or not, it still does exist within the church in Mexico. Therefore, he says, the conclusion which he draws—and which is not only a conclusion, but a fact—is that the practice does exist at this day within the church. If it exists at one place, it might, of course, exist in another.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator know whether these changes in the various articles of the creed of the Mormon Church are the result of new revelations?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator is addressing the question to me, I will confess I have little knowledge on the subject; but the Senator from New Jersey, as I take it, has a good deal of knowledge on the subject, and he is demonstrating that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] was hardly correct the other day when he said that he did not know anything about the conditions in Mexico and he did not think the Senator from New Jersey did either. The Senator from New Jersey is now demonstrating that he does know.

Mr. SPOONER. With the permission of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], I will ask the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] whether the changes in the creed of the Mormon Church are or are not based upon new revelations?

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, if the question which the Senator from Wisconsin propounds to me is as to what the church believes——

Mr. SPOONER. It only goes to the history of the church, with which I am not familiar.

Mr. RAWLINS. I suppose the Senator means whether the church itself claims that it was a revelation? I understood him to ask me if it was a revelation.

Mr. SPOONER. No; whether the Mormons claim that the changes from time to time in the original creed are assumed to be based upon revelations.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, I am unable to answer that question. The Senator from New Jersey has already read practically all that there is on that subject.

The statement in 1890 of President Woodruff, the president of the twelve apostles, contains substantially all that there is upon that subject. I think in conference some of the members of the church arose and stated that this declaration made by President Woodruff was in fact a revelation from the Almighty. That is, I understand, the situation.

Mr. SPOONER. I was curious to know whether that revelation did not apply to Mexico; whether it was general or qualified.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think the Senator from New Jersey has settled that question.

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; because the Senator from New Jersey says that it is established by the figures and authorities which he has read that this practice does now exist within the church as a part of its religious faith in Mexico, and that, in pursuance of that, they have now, as they used to have in the old days of the Mormon Church, 1,400 missionaries in Europe from Mexico. Therefore it can not be, if what the Senator from New Jersey says is true, that the practice of polygamy has been abolished by the central authority of the church, for if that were so, it would be abolished everywhere.

Mr. SPOONER. Perhaps there was a proviso that it should not apply to Mexico.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course, I do not know whether the revelation applied to Mexico or not.

Mr. HOAR. Probably those who made the revelation did not understand Spanish.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That may be.

Mr. RAWLINS. Do I understand the Senator from Indiana to say that 1,400 Mormon missionaries have been sent from Mexico?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. You did not understand the Senator from Indiana to say anything on his own authority. I understood the Senator from New Jersey to say—and he can answer the Senator—that 1,400 missionaries had been sent, or was it 14,000?

Mr. KEAN. Fourteen hundred.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from New Jersey can answer. He has the authorities before him, from which he has read. I know nothing about the subject. I have not investigated it, but the Senator from New Jersey has. He has made some very important statements here and backed them up by authority which he says is reliable and recent.

Mr. RAWLINS. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey, with his permission, as I am interested in having accurate information presented to the Senate upon this question, if his statement was to the effect that 1,400 Mormon missionaries have been sent from Mexico?

Mr. KEAN. Not entirely from Mexico, but the Mormon Church has sent out 1.400 missionaries.

Mr. RAWLINS. The church to which the Senator refers has a very large number of missionaries in Europe, in the United States, and in various Pacific islands, but they have not been sent from Mexico.

It is fair to say in this connection that the church proclaims that these missionaries are instructed not to inculcate the doctrine of the practice of polygamy in their missionary labors, but they are engaged in proselyting, making converts to the church and to the doctrines of the church as now proclaimed.

Mr. KEAN. When was the doctrine of the church ever proclaimed differently from the way it stood originally?

Mr. RAWLINS. The Senator, I think, has accurately presented the facts in regard to that. The manifesto issued by President Woodruff in 1890 declared that, so far as polygamy was concerned, he intended to conform to the law. He advised his followers to do likewise and to contract no marriage in violation of the law. The conference adopted that, and some members of the church proclaimed that that came to the people as a revelation. Whether that amounted to a modification or a change in the doctrine of the church is a matter of which Senators are as competent to judge as I am.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator a question, with his permission, before he sits down.

Mr. RAWLINS. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Is it not a fact that President Woodruff himself claimed that it was a revelation?

Mr. RAWLINS. I am not quite sure as to that. The Senator from New Jersey has read the language of President Woodruff. As the Senator from Colorado has already said, President Woodruff was generally recognized by all who knew him as a very frank, open, and sincere man, who would not probably claim anything as a revelation unless he believed it was a revelation. He stated that it was his purpose, after prayerful consideration, to obey the laws against polygamy, and he advised his followers to do likewise. I think that is what he said. Whether he intended to go beyond that I do not know.

Mr. DEPEW. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if it was understood that that revelation—if it was a revelation—applied only to Mormons in the territory of the United States where the Edmunds law was in force, but as to States and countries where polygamy was not prohibited the doctrine of the church still prevailed?

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, the documents in possession of the Senator from New Jersey can more accurately answer the Senator's question than I can; and you will observe the tenor of the statement in the declaration of the church. I do not care to put my interpretation upon it.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. RAWLINS. If the Senator from New Jersey will permit me, I ought perhaps to add, in answer to the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], a word bearing upon the question he propounded to me, as to whether this declaration in regard to polygamy was intended to apply only to the territory where polygamy was forbidden by law, that I recall now the fact that subsequently to that, in 1898, I think, President Snow, who was president of the Mormon Church, issued a declaration that the effect of all this was to forbid polygamous marriages not only in Utah and elsewhere in the United States, but throughout the world, and that it was a rule which was binding universally on the members of the church. I recall that since the question was propounded to me. I have not a copy of that proclamation of President Snow, but I am quite certain it was issued.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, I find here what purports to be a proclamation of the president of the Mormon Church. This seems to have been a communication addressed by the president to the members of the church at Salt Lake City in September, 1890, in which this occurs:

> In 1890 the head of the Mormon Church in "anguish and prayer cried to God for help for his flock and received the permission to advise the members of the Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter-Day Saints that the law commanding polygamy was henceforth suspended."

The head of the church was an able man, familiar with the English language, a lawgiver as well as a law writer, and in this effort, if it was an effort, to take away from the church the stigma of polygamy, as people of other faiths regard it, he does not say that polygamy and polygamous marriages are hereafter prohibited, but the proclamation is that the head of the Mormon Church in "anguish and prayer cried to God for help for his flock," and that "the law commanding polygamy was henceforth suspended." But whether they simply suspended it without prohibiting it, or suspended it and the suspension has died out and the permission is renewed, or the prohibition, such as it is, is removed, no one can tell unless we have a revelation from the Mormon Church itself.

But I think, Mr. President, that the word "suspended" is a very peculiar one in connection with an alleged repeal of a doctrine against which there is such feeling and moral sentiment all over the United States.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from New York will permit me, I suggest that the doubt which he now expresses he may be able to have authoritatively cleared up on this floor at the next session of Congress.

Mr. DEPEW. That is the only argument I have heard which seems to favor the admission of a Mormon Senator to the United States Senate. [Laughter.]

Monday, February 9, 1903.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, on Saturday last, at the close of my remarks for the day, I stated that I had concluded somewhat my discussion in regard to Mormonism and polygamy in Arizona; but from the discussion that followed and the comments in the press I do not think the paper I read was quite understood. So I will again call the attention of the Senate to the paper.

It seems to be the impression that the statement regarding polygamy in Mexico was made by a German writer who had traveled through Mexico. While that is true, it is not entirely a correct statement, as it leaves out the most important feature.

The President of Mexico, wishing to call the attention of Germany to the advantages of Mexico for investment, appointed Mr. Lemcke, a special commissioner of the department of public works, to investigate and report upon the "country and its people." He was provided with official letters to the heads of State governments and other officials, who were requested to assist him as much as possible in the work he had undertaken.

Mr. Lemcke, in the preface of his report, makes his acknowledgment of the official help of the Mexican Government in its preparation. This publication is, therefore, in the nature of an official report, and what it contains is recognized as a fact by the Mexican Government, because that Government assisted in its preparation.

In his report Mr. Lemcke investigated many subjects concerning the industrial, agricultural, and mining conditions of Mexico, and among other topics he wrote a chapter on the Mormon colonies, an extract from which I read. In all of his remarks about the Mormons he is most friendly and calls attention to their peculiar and particular qualities. He speaks of their colonies in the most glowing manner, and there is not a word of adverse criticism in his remarks. What he says regarding them can therefore be taken as correct, especially as it has passed the espionage of the Mexican Government.

When the laws passed by Congress were finally enforced in Utah, many Mormons who were "persecuted," as they claimed, by their enforcement ceased the practice of polygamy, but those who did not emigrated to other lands. Of these a large number went to Mexico and there established themselves. I want to call attention here to what Mr. Lemcke says after he had made a careful investigation: "The Book of Mormon allows polygamy, but not in the sense of immorality." I have shown that the "Doctrine and Covenants" of the Mormon Church still permit polygamy, and that a later revelation, which suspended it, is not printed in that book. At least I have called the attention of the Senate to that fact. Mr. Lemcke further says, and please note these words, for I think they are conclusive:

It must be looked upon as a great work of the Mexican Government and demonstrates—demonstrates its tolerance, that about sixteen years ago they granted an asylum to Mormons driven out of the United States.

Here, again, I beg to call the attention of Senators to the language—

Mr. President, the United States Government never drove a Mormon from its territory. The Mormons fled because they said they were persecuted. They fled because the laws of the United States prohibited polygamy, and they, wishing to continue the practice, fled to Mexico, which Government "demonstrated its tolerance" by permitting them to practice it—granted them an asylum.

Now, Mr. President, I have had the laws of Mexico looked through very carefully to see if there are any statutes prohibiting polygamy, and I have only found the following, which I will read. I wish first to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], who, I am sorry, I do not see present, to those laws, as he stated, with all the positiveness that he is able to do, that the Government of Mexico was dominated by the Catholic Church, which would never permit polygamy.

Laws of reform, September 25, 1873 (translation); part of the constitution of the United States of Mexico (this is not a literal translation): Article 1 states that the church is independent of Congress, and that Congress has no power to pass laws establishing or prohibiting religion. Article 2 states that marriage is a civil contract and the civil authorities are alone permitted to perform the ceremonies.

This is all the law I have been able to find on the subject in the statutes of Mexico. Perhaps the Senator from Colorado in his zeal may be able to find something further.

Mr. President, the great majority of the people in Mexico are Roman Catholics, but the Government is no more under the domination of that church than this Government is. Everybody knows that the church in Mexico has long since lost its power in that Government.

Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] said on Saturday last that he does not fear the influence of the Mormon Church in these Territories—that their numbers are too small. We have no accurate statistics as to their number in Arizona at the present time. I call attention to the lack of statistics as to the number of Mormons at the present time in Arizona. The church census under the census of 1900 has not yet been published, as far as I can get it, and the only one that I have to go by is the census of 1890. By the census of 1890 there were 6,500 Mormons in the Territory of Arizona, and I think it is safe to estimate that they have increased as rapidly in that Territory as the other population has advanced.

The population there has increased, according to the last census, about 100 per cent, and according to the estimates of the Territorial officers in Arizona, if they are to be believed, it has increased 200 per cent. The Senator from Colorado said that he did not believe there had been a census taken which covered half of the population of Arizona and New Mexico. If he is right, how many Mormons are in Arizona to-day? I should say that from 15,000 to 20,000 Mormons in Arizona would be a very small proportion of the existing population.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator at hand the figures showing the entire population of Arizona in 1890, when the Mormon population showed 6,500 in number?

Mr. KEAN. I have it here somewhere. I do not recall the figures exactly at the present moment. I think, if I remember rightly, the population of Arizona in 1890 was about 60,000. The Mormon population according to the census of 1890 was 6,500.

Mr. HALE. That would be more than 10 per cent.

Mr. KEAN. It would be more than 10 per cent.

Mr. HALE. And it would in any political contest easily hold the balance of power.

Mr. KEAN. The Senator from Maine is entirely correct, as he always is.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HALE. Will not the Senator from Georgia wait a moment?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Is the Senator from New Jersey confident that his figures—6,500—as to the Mormon population in 1890 are correct? There are other figures which show a Mormon population almost twice that number. I think the Senator from Wisconsin has later figures.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. KEAN. I have here a statement of the communicants of the different churches, according to House Miscellaneous Document, first session Fifty-second Congress, 1891–92, volume 50, part 1, page 427. Here is the census of the Church of the Latter-Day Saints in the United States, and it gives by counties and States the number of churches organized, and so on. Here is Arizona, the organization by counties.

Mr. HALE. And the total?

Mr. KEAN. The total number of communicants, of members, is 6,500. They have a seating capacity of 4,815 in their churches, and 16 church edifices.

Mr. HOAR. That would not include the children.

Mr. KEAN. The value of their church property is $26,400.

Mr. HALE. Does the number 6,500 include the entire families or only what are called communicants?

Mr. KEAN. Those are the communicants.

Mr. HALE. As the Senator from Massachusetts suggests, that would not represent the children of Mormon families.

Mr. KEAN. It represents only the communicants. Of course there are a great many more Mormons in the Territory than the number given in the census. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator from Wisconsin has later figures.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from New Jersey yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I take from the very able speech of the Senator from California [Mr. BARD], which is full of information and the result of very careful study, the following statement:

In 1889 Governor Wolfley, in urging Congress to reestablish the Territorial law which disfranchised all who practiced, taught, or encouraged polygamy, and which had been repealed by the last legislature of the Territory, speaks of them as follows:

"Morally and politically the Mormons are an unwelcome and a dangerous element. Morally, their teaching and encouraging, if not actually practicing, polygamy is against all established Christian law, moral or religious. * * * Politically, the Mormons seem to have adopted the plan of sending colonies or "stakes" to the surrounding Territories in sufficient numbers to form a balance of power between the two political parties. They are willing to trade with either, but remain true only so long as the interests of the church are best served.

"The church is their law, and all other law is subservient to the orders of the church. They are therefore a most dangerous and unscrupulous factor in politics, without regard to party. Four years ago they voted for the Republican Delegate to Congress; two years ago and last year they voted for the Democratic Delegate, in payment for the repeal of the above-referred-to disfranchising act, passed by my late predecessor. Who they will next vote for will depend upon who will or who can make them the best offer or do them the most service." (House Ex. Docs., 1889-1890, Fifty-first Congress, first session, vol. 13, pp. 250-251.)

Governor Wolfley states that at that time the Mormons numbered about 8,000. In the following year, 1890, Governor N. O. Murphy estimates the number of Mormons in Arizona at 12,000—one-fifth of her population under the census of 1890.

Mr. HALE. That is nearly twice the number given in the figures presented by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, I read further from the speech of the Senator from California, and this is very interesting:

In his report for 1893 Governor L. C. Hughes makes a statement regarding the strength of the various church organizations in the Territory at that time, from which we find that the Mormons had more churches in the Territory than any other denomination. He also informs us that in the last election the Mormons cast a vote of 1,500 out of a total vote of 7,738 cast on the question of the adoption of a constitution. He further says concerning the Mormon population: "This population does not exceed one-eighth of our people." But it will be observed that the Mormon vote was about one-fifth of the whole vote cast on the question of adoption of a constitution.

It was about one-fifth of the entire vote cast on that question.

Mr. HALE. About 20 per cent.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

Mr. KEAN. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CLAY. Did I understand the Senator from New Jersey to state that the population of Arizona in 1890 was 60,000?

Mr. KEAN. I said it is my recollection that it was about 60,000.

Mr. CLAY. That is a little over ten years ago. I ask the Senator, is it not true that the population of Arizona, by the census of 1900, was 125,000?

Mr. KEAN. Yes; but it included in that the Indians, who number 28,000. The Indians were not included in the former census.

Mr. CLAY. Is it not true that the population of Arizona had doubled during the last ten years?

Mr. KEAN. I do not think it is.

Mr. CLAY. It was 60,000 in 1890 and 125,000 in 1900.

Mr. KEAN. I will tell the Senator from Georgia that the same Indians were there ten years ago.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from New Jersey yield to me a minute?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator from Georgia will examine the census returns for 1890 he will find that, I think, in the neighborhood of 28,000 Indians and people on Indian reservations were omitted from the census, and hence there appears to be such an immense growth. If you add those 28,000 and others who were residing on Indian reservations in Arizona to the census of 1890, you will find that the growth has been very small, not over a rate of about 3,500 or 4,000 a year since 1890.

Mr. KEAN. But, Mr. President, it is not the number there now that I am apprehensive of, it is the number that will emigrate from Utah the instant Arizona is made a State, if her constitution permits her to grant them an asylum.

I therefore think it is of the highest importance in passing this bill that it should be amended in such way as to forever exclude polygamy. If it is not done now, it can not be done hereafter. I do not think there is such a wonderful haste that it is necessary to pass this legislation without considering the importance of what we are doing. We are doing a work for all time. We are not passing a law that is subject to the repeal of Congress, or the will of Congress, but we are making States to live as long as this Union endures. When we make those States let us make them well, so that they can take their part with the other States in the Union and cast no slur or disgrace upon their sister States by their practices or by their laws.

I believe, Mr. President, that thousands of Mormons could and would go over the line in a few weeks from Utah into Arizona, for they have plenty of people to spare in Utah. Utah with its enormous population could easily help to control Arizona. Inside of a year I think the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] will bear me out when I say that the State of Utah can send people enough into Arizona to control the whole government of that State, if it were a State.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. I can not agree with the statement which the Senator from New Jersey has just made. In Utah we have about 275,000 people. A majority of those people are members of the Mormon Church, but any statement here which would imply that all members of the Mormon Church who are voters would obey the dictates even of the leaders of their church in political matters would be extravagant. There are quite a number of the Mormon people who would so submit, but by no possibility, according to my judgment, could the Mormon people now having their homes in Utah be induced to break up and leave their homes to go to Arizona for the purpose of controlling it as a State.

Doubtless members of the Mormon Church who might go to Arizona would exercise some control in its political affairs, but I would not desire to pass in silence the statement made by the Senator from New Jersey, when he appealed to me and said that in a very short time a sufficient number of the Mormon population of Utah would be induced to go into Arizona for the purpose of controlling its politics. I do not think that a possibility.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Utah for his statement. I partially agree with him. But, Mr. President, the Mormon Church, as everyone knows, is all powerful. The Mormon Church, if they desire, could send people enough from Utah into Arizona to control it. I do not know that they would, but it seems to me that we ought to prevent such an occurrence, if it were possible to do it.

Mr. RAWLINS. Will the Senator permit me in that connection?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. While we are upon the question of the influence of the Mormon people upon the government or politics of Utah or Arizona, I think it is fair to state that the masses of the Mormon people are themselves interested in good government, and in counties where they have absolute control in the administration of local affairs they furnish as a rule honest and economic government. Those people are a frugal and industrious people. Many of them are engaged in agricultural pursuits. While they have their peculiar notions upon the subject of religion, in my judgment they are not a dangerous people. Left free to carry out their own notions of propriety in the administration of government, they are a valuable people in a community.

I think in Wyoming, and doubtless in Arizona, those Mormon people who are engaged in peacefully following their pursuits are helping to maintain good government there. In my own State in certain localities non-Mormons in some instances would prefer to have that balance wheel, so to speak, in leading to economy and conservatism in the administration of local affairs, against men who are not so thoroughly interested in the State or the more transient population. I know in Salt Lake City, where a very large majority of the population is non-Mormon, the non-Mormons themselves are glad to vote for and elect Mormons to important political offices because of their value and their desire to give to the municipality good government.

So, in anything I may say here I do not want to have it understood that the Mormon people are dangerous to good government anywhere. What I would say, and all that I would say, in respect to that is that certain elements in the Mormon Church by reason of long habits are disposed to yield too much to the dictates of the prominent individuals in the church. When these may possibly have some purpose of their own to subserve it is not to be denied that their influence is very considerable among the Mormon people. Still, there is a very large element among the Mormons who resent the idea of such interference, and to-day I do not think they are subject to the control of their leaders, especially if the attempt were made to induce them to vote in such a manner as to bring about a bad state of affairs in any State or in a locality.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I did not mean to say anything against the Mormon people themselves, because I think they are the most thrifty—I might say almost next to the Chinese in thrift—of any people I know of. Nor do I mean to say anything against their religion. But I do mean to say that the people of this country are opposed to the practice of polygamy, and they intend in every way in their power to stamp it out. Whatever aid and assistance I can give them in doing it I propose to give, and I do not propose, Mr. President, as a Senator from one of the States of the Union, to allow a bill to pass here which I consider contains provisions that do not restrict polygamy.

I read the other day from a little book put out by the Mormon Church their boast as to how they were spreading and how they occupied 1,500 miles of the backbone of the American continent; and they seem to think that they can include in their sway all this 1,500 miles. They seem to think that they can control Arizona and New Mexico, and even part of old Mexico. Here are some of the doctrines——

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Is there not very great danger of the Mormons in Mexico, who are full-fledged Mormons not only in theory but in practice, coming across the line and mixing in politics in Arizona and attempting to usurp public authority in that State, if we admit it?

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, everyone knows that this colony in Chihuahua was established by people who fled from Utah, who have been fostered by the Mexican Government. There they practice polygamy, and they can come back to the United States. They are all ready to come back to the United States. Of course the laws of Utah are strict, and therefore they do not like to practice polygamy openly there, but if no provision is made in regard to Arizona and New Mexico when admitted to the Union, they can come back from Chihuahua and so help control Arizona and New Mexico.

Here is a statement of other doctrines of the church:

Of the other principles believed in by the Latter-Day Saints there is not upon this occasion opportunity to speak at length. These are: The gathering of Israel; the restoration of the Ten Tribes; the support of earthly governments for the protection of human rights—

That they claim to be one of the greatest—

the building up of Zion and rebuilding of Jerusalem; the resurrection; the second coming of Christ to reign as Lord of Lords and King of Kings—all of which are doctrines of the Bible, as clearly maintained in its teachings as those which have been spoken of.

The Latter-Day Saints believe—indeed, testify—that they know they are fulfilling the predicted gathering of Israel in the last days by the command and power of God; that their gathering on the American continent is upon the land of Zion, the land of Joseph, whose blessings have prevailed "unto the utmost bounds of the everlasting hills."

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. KEAN. With pleasure.

Mr. HALE. Every time, Mr. President, that this phase of the subject is reached new information is presented to us showing the gravity of the situation, showing the likelihood that in all this belt of States the Mormon Church, as a church, is so situated and is under such conditions that it can easily hold the balance of political power and can control absolutely the votes of its followers for the purpose of determining elections. That is almost the most serious consideration that can be presented to us in dealing with these up to this time unformed populations so far as statehood is concerned.

Another thing. I want to ask the Senator, is he satisfied with the provisions in the bill reported by the minority of the committee—the omnibus bill—touching the practice of polygamy in those Territories when they shall become a State or States? Does he think upon that practice that those provisions are strong enough?

Mr. KEAN. I am glad to answer the Senator from Maine that I certainly do not.

Mr. HALE. Then, I ask the Senator further, as a member of the committee, who has given great attention to and has studied the subject thoroughly, if he has prepared or will prepare such an amendment upon that branch of the subject?

Mr. KEAN. I shall be very glad to attempt to prepare one. I have not one prepared at the present time, but I think one ought to be prepared.

Mr. HALE. I am very glad to hear the Senator say so, Mr. President, because, before anything is done in this matter, the sense of the Senate should be determined upon this very grave question. If the minority bill ought to be amended, so that proper safeguards and penalties shall be thrown around this practice in these proposed new States, then, clearly, somebody should submit amendments that would be presented to the Senate, so that we shall have an expression of the feeling of the Senate upon this subject before anything further is done. I am glad to hear the Senator say that he has in contemplation amendments of that kind, which will bring the subject determinately before the Senate for its action.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I was reading from the book of the Latter-Day Saints—their Religion, History, Condition, and Destiny, published by the Mormon Church in 1902, in which it is said:

Finally, about 12,000 who had escaped the exterminating order of Missouri's mob found a resting place in Illinois, and built up the beautiful city of Nauvoo. But the refuge was only temporary, for the bigot and the criminal united in a relentless and bloody warfare upon them. Less than six years after their expulsion from Missouri their prophet was assassinated in Carthage jail, while in the hands of the officers of the law and under the pledged protection of the governor of the State, Thomas Ford. This was on June 27, 1844. Joseph Smith had committed no offense, he was guilty of no wrong. "The law can not reach him, but powder and ball shall," was the cry of his murderers. The blood of the martyred prophet and his fellow-religionists still cries to God for vengeance!

The enemies of the Saints, however, were doomed to disappointment, for the death of the prophet did not stop the work or break up the church organization. The leadership devolved on the twelve apostles, with Brigham Young as their president. Even greater energy was displayed than before, and the temple at Nauvoo was soon completed. Fiendish plots were laid, and barbarous plans adopted to blacken the character of the "Mormon" people and make them appear abominable in the eyes of the public. Numerous atrocities were committed by the mobocrats, who falsely attributed them to the Saints, and thus aroused public indignation against them.

I do not think that is a true statement. Public indignation was not aroused against the Christian people trying to make homes for themselves, but public indignation was aroused against the Mormon people trying to establish on the American continent and under the protection of the flag of the United States a condition of society abhorrent to the rest of the people of the county.

As to Mormon control in this belt of territory, this 1,500 miles of which they boast as the backbone of the American continent, if anyone will observe the growth of those settlements in those States, he will see that Mormonism has grown and continues to grow in all of them. We are therefore forewarned—and to be forewarned is to be forearmed—that we should not pass any legislation that is not properly guarded in this respect.

I had hoped that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] would allow me to yield to him that I might compare the remarks he proposes to make upon the admission of New Mexico with the remarks he made in the House of Representatives in 1874, when he was the Delegate from that Territory, for at that time the figures he used seemed to be most attractive, and I should be glad to compare the figures he is about to use with those he then used, but he is not here. I think, however, that I can refer to a few points the Senator then made. He said the resources of New Mexico were principally agricultural, pastoral, and mineral. I always understood, from the statistics that I have seen that New Mexico was a little short on agriculture and a little long on pasture, with some minerals, which lately have been somewhat developed. The Senator further said at that time:

The whole Territory abounds in fertile valleys, whose soil is as rich as can be found in any portion of the United States. She excels as a wheat-producing country, and with means of transportation her flour will be sold in competition with the flour of Kansas and Missouri on the Missouri River. Irrigation is necessary to insure crops, but the large yield more than compensates for this extra expense and labor not incurred in countries where irrigation is not necessary.

It may not be improper here to refer to the grapes of New Mexico and her capacity as a wine-producing country, which is certainly not surpassed in the United States.

Then she was going to rival California, I suppose, because the Senator said:

The valleys of the Rio Grande and Pecos rivers especially produce grapes in the greatest profusion. Although cultivated in a rude and imperfect way as yet, the wine produced is a good table wine, and compares favorably with many of the Rhine wines.

I am sorry the Senator from West Virginia is not here, so that he might answer some of these little illusions of his made in 1874.

Mr. HALE. What is the date of that deliverance of the present Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. KEAN. The date is May 21, 1874.

Speech of Hon. S. B. ELKINS, of New Mexico, in the House of Representatives, May 21, 1874.

The House, according to order, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2418) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. HALE. If I may be allowed, Mr. President, I think this brings up very vividly, not only to my mind, but to the mind and the memory of the occupant of the chair, my colleague [Mr. FRYE], for we were both in the House of Representatives at that time—and I recall it very distinctly—that the present Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], who was then a Delegate from New Mexico, was extremely earnest and enthusiastic in then pressing a bill for the admission of New Mexico as a State, and I remember what he said, having heard it or read it at the time.

The reports that were then given out in favor of the measure disclosed a situation in New Mexico far beyond anything that exists there to-day. The population was as large and the fertility and the resources of the Territory were brought forth in such an abundant fashion that almost everybody was ashamed to vote against the admission of New Mexico. I see now, as the Senator from New Jersey reads this account of the fertility, that in what at that time was considered as a joke of the then Delegate from New Mexico he only fell short of that fine Irish speech which was made in the British Parliament by an Irish orator in favor of the union of Ireland with England, when he said, "Sir, this measure will be everything for Ireland; it will change her barren hills to fertile valleys." [Laughter.] That is about the only thing that was not then said in favor of the admission of New Mexico. The arguments presented a much more hopeful condition of affairs there then than is now claimed.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, to continue reading from the speech of the Senator from West Virginia, then the Delegate from New Mexico, he said:

The valleys of the Rio Grande and Pecos rivers especially produce grapes in the greatest profusion. Although cultivated in a rude and imperfect way as yet, the wine produced is a good table wine, and compares favorably with many of the Rhine wines.

Now, Mr. President, let us see what the governor of New Mexico has to say in regard to the wine industry in that Territory. I will read from his last report, in which he says:

I am indebted to Judge J. F. Weilandy, of Santa Fe, an authority on grape culture, for the following:

* * * * * * *

"While it is not now possible to definitely ascertain the date of the beginning of grape culture in New Mexico, there is no doubt that it was introduced in the Rio Grande Valley long before the first grape vines were planted in California. * * *

"There is no data—at least no valuable data—given through which the value of the wine product of New Mexico could be ascertained; for exaggerations, such as that an acre of vine land will yield 1,350 gallons of wine on an average, are not deserving of notice. But it is safe to say that it does not amount to one tithe of the production of wine in California." * * *

This, Mr. President, is the opinion of an expert written nearly thirty years after the Senator from West Virginia made his speech in favor of statehood for New Mexico.

In the report of the Twelfth Census I find that New Mexico stands No. 42 among the States and Territories as a fruit producer, which of course includes grapes.

Mr. President, I might continue until the end of this session making such comparisons, but it is not my desire to do so. I think this one is sufficient to show that, if the statements made at that time were true, New Mexico has advanced very slowly the past thirty years. If they were padded for the purpose of influencing legislation, how can we believe the statements made by the advocates of this bill in regard to the present condition of the Territories?

Mr. President, I have not heard or read one good argument in favor of the admission of Arizona or New Mexico. Every speech made by those favoring the admission of these Territories is based entirely upon sentiment. I have heard a great many good reasons why they should not be admitted and I consider the most important of them all is the possible tolerance of polygamy.

The only certain check upon the progress of this evil, and the only solution of the problem it presents, is found in bringing polygamy within the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, where officers will owe no political obligation or allegiance to the influential criminals whom they are called upon to prosecute for this class of offenses. This can be provided for in the constitutions of the Territories. Until it is done, Mr. President, I can not vote to admit them to statehood.

Eulogy on the Life and Character of the Late Representative Moody of North Carolina.

HON. SPENCER BLACKBURN,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 22, 1903,

On the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted, the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of the Hon. JAMES MONTRAVILLE MOODY, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of North Carolina.

"Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a faithful and distinguished public servant, the House at the conclusion of the memorial proceedings shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk be, and he is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased."

Mr. BLACKBURN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Another passenger is cast upon the echoless shore. One of our comrades is gone. Time's relentless tide heaves unceasingly, and back from the cruel breakers of the great unknown comes no message. MOODY of North Carolina has joined the innumerable hosts and answers to the roll call of another house. The stillness of the grave shrouds in silent mystery all that was mortal of our contemporary. His seat is vacant and the work he was seemingly chosen to do remains unfinished. He goes out and is among us no more. His stalwart manhood succumbed to the cruel edicts of fate and we know him only for what he was. His sudden taking off is a sad reminder that to us all death comes soon or late. His work, only begun, remains as an earnest of what his genius might have accomplished had he been spared a little while longer. In his brief career, to those who knew him well, are many traits of character we might well emulate. Born in western North Carolina in February, 1858, remote from the centers of population and the advantages of educational facilities, he accomplished much more than most of us. His parents were poor, but gave to him as an heritage those sterling qualities of manhood and integrity which make themselves felt, whether in the remote sections of our great land or the greatest centers of intelligence. From the lofty peaks, among which he spent his childhood, he gathered inspiration and drank in the deep drafts of worthy ambition.

His early life was not unlike that of the many hundreds of whom he was one, but his young soul was not content with the mere humdrum, and life held for him greater charms and the future rare prizes, won by those only who have the energy to seek and the ability to acquire. In the simple surroundings of his childhood there was no trail to direct him, but his genius blazed the path and MOODY'S ambition and energy built the highway which identified him with the legislation of his State and nation ere he had reached the noontide of life. In early years he studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practiced in the town of Waynesville, N. C., from which point he was soon able to reach out and make himself felt in all the important litigation of the entire district, which he afterwards represented on the floor of this Chamber. In 1884 he was elected mayor of this town. In 1886 he was elected solicitor of his district, and served his people and State with considerate and marked ability.

In 1892 the Republican State convention nominated him for lieutenant-governor of North Carolina, and he canvassed the State for his principles and party in his own forceful and dignified way. Two years later he went to the legislature of North Carolina, representing the interest of his people and maintaining the principles of his party with all the energy and force of his broad nature. When the Spanish war was upon us, President McKinley honored him with a commission of major in the ranks of the volunteer forces of our Army, where he remained until the protocol was signed and peace declared. November 6, 1900, found him Congressman-elect from the Ninth North Carolina district, in which position he served his remaining days. His people loved him as their own. Their every wish was his; his every interest theirs. He served them with a devotion both interesting and pathetic, and his untimely taking off was to them as deep a regret as to us a surprise and pain.

In disposition he was amiable and kind, in decision firm, in all things honest, at all times sympathetic, ever manly. One of nature's own noblemen, he spent his life in sunshine and the accomplishment of good. Born and reared in one of nature's great ampitheaters, surrounded by lofty peaks and uprising hills, he learned her lessons and taught her philosophy. His mind reached beyond the narrow limits of district and State lines and his one object was the welfare of our common country. Against conditions sterile and uninviting in his beginning, he staked his manhood, and ere the brief lapse of one generation's history he had written his name upon the permanent records of his country. By sheer force of character, good-fellowship, generous nature, and kind thought beyond the range of those about him, he was leader. The world looks for men to do things; when the time came MOODY was there. In politics he was a Republican, but the bitterest foe in political strife would not dare suggest aught against his character, manhood, integrity, or broad generosity.

He fought for what he conceived to be right, upon that broad plane which guarantees at all times the right to think and act as we deem best. He had delved in the darkness and emerged into light. Out of the crude he molded order, and with all he found generous friendship. He was primarily one of the people. Up from the simple walks of life he forged his course, never forgetting the route by which he came or those met upon the way. In his walk there was no boast of heraldry or pomp of power, but the genuine simplicity of a nature true to itself and those about it. The glamour of pompous show appealed in vain to his sturdy mind, and he lived as he was, one of the great mass. From the barefoot boy of a few brief summers gone he had emerged into the lawyer, the legislator, the statesman, and in this Hall we knew him as a representative of his people, laboring at all times for their welfare and their good.

The measure of greatness is not so much what is done as the means by which it is accomplished. In the affairs of this life is is ordinarily results that count, and vastly greater is the genius of the architect who builds the structure of material of his own mold than he who places together that which is already prepared by some one else. Of the first class was MOODY. He had hewn his own timber, molded his own fastenings, and erected his own structure. How well he did it the history of his country and people will tell. Struck down in the vigor of manhood, the beginning of permanent usefulness, we can but speculate his future career and mourn his sad demise. He was here in season and out of season for the people who trusted him and loved him, and their confidence he never abused.

With ceaseless energy he had labored for the fulfillment of his one dream. The Appalachian Park was his hope, and upon its establishment he had set his heart. With patience and anxiety he awaited the opportune hour to tell his people that his work was completed, but it never came. The pale horse and his rider passed this way and another light went out. Those of us still here bow to the will of Him who holds us in the hollow of His hand and doeth all things well and await with simple resignation the final all. This day we dedicate to the memory of those who have preceded us. MOODY'S name we call with reverence; true as a friend, kind and patient as a husband, indulgent as a father, honest as a citizen and legislator, we pay to him this last rite, extend to his community, friends, and bereaved family our deepest sympathy, and record it upon the pages of our country's history.

For him no more the blazing hearth shall burn,
Or busy housewife ply her evening care;
No children run to lisp their sire's return,
Or climb his knee, the envied kiss to share.

All that was mortal of him we have laid to rest in the silent churchyard among his native hills. There he sleeps silently, peacefully, in the bosom of his country and his God, awaiting his final summons and eternal reward.

The Life and Character of the Late Hon. John L. Sheppard.

HON. JAMES L. SLAYDEN, OF TEXAS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Sunday, January 25, 1903,

On the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted, the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of Hon. JOHN L. SHEPPARD, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Texas.

"Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a faithful and distinguished public servant, the House, at the conclusion of the memorial proceedings of this day, shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk be, and is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased."

Mr. SLAYDEN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: JOHN L. SHEPPARD, of the Fourth Congressional district, was the third and last of the Texas Representatives who were summoned in such a brief period to answer to the final roll call.

He was distinguished in his profession and conspicuous for the possession of those virtues that make a man marked among his neighbors and eminent as a citizen.

While his career in Congress was not extended, it was yet long enough to reflect honor on himself and his constituency.

I have always had peculiar respect for the office of judge. To be a just judge is, in my view, to reach the pinnacle of civic honor. Judge SHEPPARD had the reputation of being such a man. He had an exalted idea of the duties and obligations of his position, whether on the bench or in the legislative hall. He did his public work so well that it never merited nor received serious adverse criticism; and his private life was so blameless that it might well serve as a model to the young men of the country. He left to his family the choicest of all legacies—an honored name.

The shield of the kindly Roman maxim—of the dead speak nothing but good—is not needed to protect the reputation of JOHN L. SHEPPARD.

Naval Appropriation Bill.

HON. WILLARD D. VANDIVER,
OF MISSOURI,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Tuesday, February 17, 1903.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 17288) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes—

Mr. VANDIVER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: If I may have the indulgence of the House for a few moments, I only wish, briefly, to refer to one or two matters that may come up later in the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule. It is not my purpose to indulge in any lengthy discussion or in the consideration of any outside matter. It has occurred to me, however, that the rapid rate which we are traveling in our effort to build up a navy is hardly warranted by the necessities or the requirements of the case. Not that I would impede the proper progress of the Navy. I am in favor of making a substantial, continuous progress in strengthening the American Navy, but I do not believe it is wise, prudent, or economic for us to go ahead authorizing contracts to be made for the construction of vessels that can not be built within the next four or five years.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy, which I have before me, shows that we have now a large number of vessels contracted for and in course of construction that will require at least four years to complete. We are also informed that the plans and specifications for the construction of such authorized vessels are practically the same as those which have been adopted for vessels constructed ten years ago. Now, it occurs to me that in the true American spirit of progress we ought not to wish to go along in one direction with our eyes closed to every other possible improvement. It seems to me that the building of great battle ships, heavily armored, has reached the limit of scientific construction. We have been for years and years proceeding along one line. We have apparently ignored every other means, every other opportunity, for the development of the American Navy.

Now, I do not wish to be understood as opposing anything that is necessary for the development of the Navy; but we are in danger, it seems to me, of coming to the same condition within the next few years that we reached about forty years ago. The old wooden ship that was in use during the civil war in a certain sense, I may say, received its "knock-out blow" in the contest of the Monitor and the Merrimac. From that time until now we have proceeded on one idea of the armor-clad battle ship. The world received a shock in that contest, and the trend of public sentiment and public opinion—the whole tendency of thought—in connection with the development of the Navy has received its direction and its impetus from that great battle. From that time down to now we have been proceeding upon the theory on the one side that we are to construct an irresistible coating of armor that will protect our battle ships and our sailors from the heaviest and strongest projectiles, while on the other hand a different set of inventors and manufacturers have been proceeding on exactly the opposite theory—that we are to construct a gun with sufficient power of projection to penetrate any armor plate that can be manufactured.

At first it was observed that a coat of 6-inch armor plate would protect the battle ship against the strongest guns then known to warfare. But it very soon developed that the invention of a new gun gave sufficient power to penetrate the 6-inch armor. As soon as that was done, the advocates of heavy armor plate invented a new method of manufacturing armor that made it harder and more nearly impenetrable, and at the same time by thickening the plate made it strong enough to protect the vessel from this new gun. Then some ambitious gun maker, after experiments with conical pointed projectiles and improvements that increased their power, soon developed another gun that would penetrate a 10-inch armor plate. The armor plate must be thickened again. And so it went up to 12 and 14 inches. As soon as that was done, the gun makers came up again to the requirements, and manufactured a gun that would penetrate 14-inch armor plate.

Again the armor plate was thickened and hardened. We have fought over and over again here the question of making armor plate, and what was the best kind of plate and the proper price to pay for it, and all that. The armor-plate manufacturers then raised the limit to the 18-inch plate, the harveyized process being employed to make it, as it was supposed, the hardest possible, and then after that we were informed that the Krupp armor was even better than the harveyized plate, and so we got to the 18-inch armor plate of the Krupp manufacture.

Now, then, we are confronted with another advance in gun manufacture. Within the last few months we have had demonstrated the fact, by actual experiment with the newest and latest gun, that it can be fired a distance of 18 miles, and that its projectile will penetrate 18-inch armor plate of the hardest kind that has ever been made.

So we have had this battle going on for the last ten or fifteen years at least, on the one side being the manufacturers of armor plate and on the other side the manufacturers of guns. And so the contest has waged back and forth. But strange to say, both the armor-plate manufacturers and the gun manufacturers get their chief inspiration from the United States Treasury, because the funds are supplied to both sides of this contest out of the common treasury of the people. Now, I do not wish to impute to any fellow-member on this floor any improper motive. I only go this far in suggesting that the most potent influence that has been brought to bear upon legislation for the building of battle ships and the making of armor plate seems to have come from those districts and those sections of the country in which these great establishments are located, which draw their sustenance from the public Treasury.

Now, then, after this desultory statement of the case, it occurs to me that we are in danger of coming up to the point at which our whole strength of organization and effort is concentrated upon one idea, and that idea, like the one which furnished the foundation of the old wooden fleet, is liable to be blown up in an explosion at any moment, the whole organization of the Navy Department receiving such a shock that a new turn must be given to the development of the Navy. I do not want to see the time when the United States Navy, with over $200,000,000 invested in battle ships, cruisers, and armor plate, will be set at naught and appraised as valueless, because of some new discovery that we have not availed ourselves of and have not reckoned with.

I discover from some little investigation of naval reports and press dispatches and cablegrams from other countries that at this very time the great naval powers of the world, not content, as we have been for the most part, in pursuing only one line of development, are giving their attention to various lines of development, especially, I might say, in experimenting with other kinds of vessels, torpedo boats and submarine torpedo boats, torpedo-boat destroyers, and other equipments of the navy. At this very time the British navy, the greatest in the world in point of numbers of ships and of men, are engaged in apparently a very determined effort to discover some more effective and cheaper means of coast defense. And so they are building submarine boats and torpedo boats and things of that kind.

I have noticed also that the French Government is developing its submarine fleet with greater rapidity than the English or any other government. I notice also that the Norwegian Government and the Russian Government are experimenting with these new devices. I am frank to say that I believe the time will come, and it will not be far distant either, when great submarine fleets will camp beneath the surface of the ocean, and in a short time destroy your great battle ships that have cost $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 apiece, and that with a $150,000 or $200,000 vessel, two of which in any harbor of the world will be able to defend it against a whole fleet of battle ships. I say that the American Navy, while it is developing along all other lines, should not neglect this. I am in favor of a systematic, persistent, and constant effort to develop submarine navigation. I believe it is destined to become the best means known to modern naval warfare for coast defense, and as a matter of economy it is vastly superior to any that has been discovered.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of this brief survey, it seems to me that it would be a wiser course for us to pursue, instead of authorizing more battle ships and cruisers to be constructed, and thus giving opportunity for fat contracts reaching into the distant future four or five years or more, we ought to pause and consider. Let us wait until at least these vessels that are already authorized are in course of construction, if not completed. There are some of them already authorized in last year's bill that are not yet contracted for. Let us pause, I say, and catch up with what the rest of the world is doing in other lines before we proceed further in this direction.

We have heard something in connection with the personnel of the Navy, about "the hump" created by there being too many officers near the same age in rank and grade coming into the Navy at nearly the same time. We are in danger of having the same condition of things in reference to the ships, a great number of vessels of the same kind, immensely expensive and liable at any time to become worthless, because of new inventions and new discoveries and greater improvements in other directions. I would have the naval architects for the next year or two to spend their time in studying new devices, that we may be reaching out in other directions. We have proceeded upon one line until the thickness of the armor plate and the power of the projectile have reached their maximum limit.

You can not increase the weight of the armor any more, because when you do so you will sink your vessel with its own weight. If you have increased the power of the projectile to its maximum and can penetrate that armor, then what is the use of making any more of it?

I say it is time for us to call a halt on this particular line. I want the development of the Navy to go on, but I want it to go on along broader lines.

One other suggestion, and I am through. Reference has been made to comparisons with other nations. Within the next four years the United States Navy will be at least equal to that of Germany if we do not authorize another vessel. I am not seeking to draw any comparison for purposes of aggravation or for stimulation of national pride; but as Germany has been frequently referred to, I think it is not improper to say here that according to the records of the German naval reports for the last year that nation will have completed and in commission by the year 1906 19 battle ships and 11 armored cruisers of the first class, while the United States Government, without authorizing another single one, but completing only those which are already authorized, will by that time have 20 battle ships and 16 armored cruisers.

No other nation in the world, in my humble judgment, has a navy superior to that of the United States, except Great Britain; and with her distant colonies, with her vastly extended territory, I can conceive of no combination of circumstances that would ever make it prudent for the British navy to come in contact with ours. I believe, on the other hand, that whenever she does so the American sailor will demonstrate his superiority in gunnery and his superiority in courage—in all that goes to make up naval heroism. He has demonstrated it in every contest in which he has ever engaged. I believe we are in no danger from any such source. But should that danger ever arise, the descendants of the heroes of the past will not be wanting in ability to sustain the glory of the American Navy on any waters in the world.

I believe, sir, that the American boy, grown up in our own country, accustomed to the use of the shotgun and the rifle, and then trained to gunnery as he comes into the Navy, and with his experience in the woods as well as on the naval vessel, will always be able to hold his own with the gunners of any country on earth. [Loud applause.]

Post-Office Appropriation Bill.

OF
HON. JAMES M. GRIGGS,
OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 4, 1903.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 16990) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes—

Mr. GRIGGS said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: When the Democratic campaign book, which seems to have become so popular of late with our Republican friends, was issued, I realized that I could no more avoid responsibility for its few imperfections than I could claim for myself any credit for its very many good qualities. Therefore, when my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] took the floor on last Saturday to criticise certain figures in this book, I knew then, as I know now, that I was responsible, not only to my associates on this side of the Chamber, but to the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber and to the country at large for whatever errors, if any, the gentleman from Connecticut might be able to show up.

My friend from Connecticut begins his quarrel with the Democratic campaign book with the threadbare charge that we make the claim that anthracite coal is on the free list. I confess that this is an error. But my friend forgets to allege that the President of the United States made the same statement; he forgets to call attention to the fact that the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury made the same declaration; he forgot to say that every Republican who was on the stump in the last campaign made the same mistake. He possibly does not know that the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department furnished all of us with the alleged facts in the case. Where should we go for statistics on the tariff?

Where are we to go for figures on this question if not to the Statistical Bureau of the Government? You will find, gentlemen, in the statistical abstract compiled by the Treasury Department and in the pamphlet called "Foreign Commerce and Navigation," with which we are supplied monthly by that bureau—in every one since the Dingley law was enacted—the statement that anthracite coal is on the free list. The gentleman from Connecticut holds up his hands in holy horror, saying that this is an official misstatement by the Democratic party. The official "misstatement made by the Democratic party" was taken from the sworn official misstatement of the Republican head of the Bureau of Statistics and corroborated by the Republican President and Secretary of the Navy, and in the speeches of every Republican of sufficient prominence to get his speech in the newspapers. I admit that the country is getting in a bad way whenever there is anything found out of which the present Administration is ignorant.

Mr. LANDIS. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. GRIGGS. Oh, yes.

Mr. LANDIS. Is it not true that in the Dingley bill both bituminous coal and anthracite coal are printed as on the free list?

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes, that is true——

Mr. LANDIS. It was very easy, then, to make that mistake.

Mr. GRIGGS. With a proviso—that all coal that competes with the anthracite coal produced in America is not on the free list.

Mr. LANDIS. I know that; but I contend it is very easily explained that a mistake should have been made. I made the mistake myself twenty times on the stump during the campaign.

Mr. GRIGGS. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] suggests that the mistake which the gentleman acknowledges he made only keeps company with other mistakes which the gentleman from Indiana makes—

Mr. LANDIS. I admit that.

Mr. GRIGGS. On the stump and elsewhere.

Mr. LANDIS. I was coming to the gentleman's rescue; I am glad he appreciates my efforts.

Mr. GRIGGS. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for "coming to my rescue."

Now, then, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, that statement made in the Democratic campaign book was taken, as I have told you, from the records compiled, made up at the Treasury Department and published by the head of that Department, and if anyone is responsible for the mistake it is the Republican party, the party to which my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]—and I am sorry he is not on the floor to-day—belongs.

Now, then, it took the Treasury Department five years under the Dingley bill—the great bill to which my Republican friends attribute all the prosperity which has come to the American people during the last five years—I say it took the statistician of the Treasury Department five years to ascertain the fact that coal was not on the free list, and he did not discover it then. A New York newspaper first called attention to the fact that coal was dutiable. Now, if it required five years to ascertain that coal was not dutiable under that bill, and if it is true, as your Secretary of the Navy charged in a speech made in the last campaign, that this provision imposing a duty on anthracite coal was "sneaked" into the Dingley bill, how could the compilers of this book be expected to ascertain the truth of the situation in the short time given them? The same is true of petroleum. That is another "sneak." That was "sneaked" into the Dingley bill.

The Standard Oil Company did not need the protection of this law until the coal strike, but when the coal strike came, with all of the consequent suffering, the Standard Oil Company used this law to squeeze more blood from the people by running up the price of oil. Besides the plain provisions of the law they secured the additional protection accorded them by the ruling of the General Board of Appraisers; that oil which was refined in England, although it was imported from Russia to England in a crude state and there refined, was dutiable. At the same time the people of this country were suffering from the coal famine the Standard Oil Company was increasing its profits by putting up the price of oil; and they were protected in this by this same Dingley law.

The main quarrel of the gentleman from Connecticut with us seems to be in regard to the list of prices of leading commodities as printed in the appendix to the campaign book. The book says, in introducing that table:

The prices in the following list are mainly from the Bulletin of the Department of Labor, No. 39, March, 1902. These prices are quoted January and July, from 1896 to 1902, inclusive. The table gives the rate of duty on each article, and, when known, the trust or combine which controls the price of the article.

In this table we gave simply facts. In the comparison of the facts we attempted nothing but to state the bare truth, and, remarkable as it may seem, these truths were for the use of Republicans as well as Democrats; and I am delighted that at least a few Republicans are beginning to study the figures set forth in that book. They will find if they will go through the book from beginning to end—if they will study the figures and facts printed on every page—they will find that they, in the language of my friend's reference to me, are building better than they know.

These tables show that the price of nearly every important article is controlled by a trust which is protected by a tariff duty, and that the prices of these protected trust articles have advanced greatly since 1896.

Now, 11 of the articles named by us as on the free list, and to which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] called attention, as follows—I want gentlemen to listen—binder twine, coal, coal (broken), copper, flax, jute, petroleum (crude), petroleum (refined), petroleum (150 test), rubber, and sisal, had an average increase of 34 per cent in price. These were named in the book as being on the free list.

Now, let me call particular attention to two articles in that list of the gentleman from Connecticut, viz, binder twine and sisal. Binder twine is made from hemp imported from the Philippine Islands, and sisal, which grows in Mexico. Both articles are on the free list; but when the war in the Philippines broke out, when the ports were closed to us, when industry was destroyed for a while in those islands, binder twine, under the impulse, went up 119 per cent, and in sympathy with it sisal went up 217 per cent. Excepting these two articles, the average increase in price of the 11 articles named by the gentleman from Connecticut is 4 per cent.

Now, that is the fair and generous statement which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] presents for a comparison with another list of protected articles, the price of which he claims shows a smaller increase than the foregoing free list.

The average increase of articles on the free list named by us in the book, omitting those two articles of sisal and binder twine, one of which has advanced 119 per cent and the other 217 per cent, has been an average of 4 per cent only. The war in the Philippines increased the price of those two products, binder twine and sisal, 119 per cent in the case of one and 217 per cent in the case of the other. Now, that is a tax on our Western farmers, and was brought about solely by the Philippine war.

[At this point Mr. HILL entered the Chamber.]

Mr. GRIGGS. I am delighted to see my friend from Connecticut. I will state to him that I was just speaking of his generosity and fairness in the tables of figures set forth in his speech of last Saturday, in which he said he had been more generous to his Democratic opponents than he had to himself and to his Republican friends. My friend said it was unfair to include coal in the list of articles, and left coal out of his table, because coal had been increased in price by the strike. At the same time, the figures which he gives in his speech are for five years, up to 1901 according to his speech, but really up to 1902. That was merely a little error into which my friend from Connecticut fell. Now, then, the average increase in the price of coal up to 1902, before this strike began, was only 16½ per cent, and——

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman pardon me? The figures I gave were up to 1902.

Mr. GRIGGS. I said so.

Mr. HILL. Yes; but I left out coal because the price of coal in 1902 was influenced by extraneous circumstances, and I did not think it would be fair to use it.

Mr. GRIGGS. The gentleman said the only authority quoted in his speech was the Democratic campaign book.

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. GRIGGS. Then all of his figures must be up to the time stated in the campaign book. In his speech the gentleman said 1901, and it is so printed in the RECORD. I am sure he intended 1902.

Mr. HILL. If it is so printed in the RECORD, it is by mistake. The figures are all given up to 1902.

Mr. GRIGGS. I know that I am exonerating my friend from any juggling on that score, but what he did juggle in is this: He took the price of coal after the strike had run up the price enormously and after the Democratic campaign book had been made up and said that by adding coal to the list of articles on the free list it would make an advance of 74 or 75 per cent; but at the same time he stated that his only authority quoted in that speech was this campaign book.

Mr. HILL. And consequently I left coal out and did not put it in.

Mr. GRIGGS. And yet the strike was not on then. Coal had not gone up at that time.

Mr. HILL. In 1902?

Mr. GRIGGS. No, sir; not at the time the campaign book was compiled; and the average increase in the price of coal up to the time of the compilation of this book was 16½ per cent.

Mr. HILL. What difference does it make so long as I left it out?

Mr. GRIGGS. I am simply showing how my friend juggled to get his 74 per cent.

Mr. HILL. I did not claim 74 per cent. I said 26.

Mr. GRIGGS. I understand. The gentleman said his figures made 26 per cent, but that if he put in coal it would make 74 per cent.

Mr. HILL. But I did not put it in.

Mr. GRIGGS. You put it in in that way.

Mr. HILL. Oh, but I said I left it out in the comparison.

Mr. GRIGGS. I know the gentleman left it out of his table but put it into his speech, and that is what I am driving at now. The gentleman knows that the meanest way to convict a man before a jury is for the witness to tell the jury how fond he is of the defendant and how much he regrets the circumstances which make of him a murderer, and the meanest way to juggle with figures is to give the figures correctly and then say, "If I were to put in something else it would make so and so, but I am too fair to put that in."

Mr. HILL. Let me ask the gentleman, Did I not get the figures in making this comparison absolutely correct as quoted from the campaign text-book?

Mr. GRIGGS. Oh, I do not doubt that.

Mr. HILL. Then I do not see that I have any very serious thing to be sorry for in the statement that I made, if I gave them absolutely correctly as compiled by the gentleman himself; and I rejoice and enjoyed very much making up the comparison and, indeed, reading the whole book, for I thought it was an excellent argument for the Republican party during the campaign.

Mr. THAYER. That is something which the gentleman did not have in his own book.

Mr. GRIGGS. Did you use it?

Mr. HILL. I did.

Mr. GRIGGS. Now, I want to call attention to another table of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. Here are his 21 articles that he selected from our table of trust-controlled articles:

Mr. Hill's protected list.

Article.	Price January, 1896.	Last price.	Increase.	Per cent of increase.
Alcohol	$2.82	$2.51	$0.19	8
Brick	5.50	6.25	.75	14
Crackers	.065	.08	.015	23
Cotton flannels	.065	.0625	.0125	4
Cement, Rosendale	.85	.95	.10	12
Fish, salmon	1.65	1.65	.00	0
Ginghams	.0513	.0475	.0038	8
Glassware	1.25	1.30	.05	4
Fresh beef	.0825	.09	.0075	9
Salt pork	10.00	19.75	9.75	97
Smoked ham	.0925	.125	.0325	35
Salt beef	16.00	22.50	6.50	41
Nails, wire	2.85	2.10	.75	26
Nails, cut	2.60	2.05	.55	21
Pig iron	10.75	20.25	9.50	88
Rice	.0525	.0575	.005	10
Sugar, raw	.0375	.0337	.0038	10

Steel rails	28.00	28.00	.00	0
Tin plates	3.50	4.19	.69	20
Sugar, refined	.0472	.0475	.0003	1
Average (21)				14⅞

An average increase of 14⅞ per cent.

Mr. HILL. Fifteen and a quarter.

Mr. GRIGGS. It makes 14⅞ per cent, but your figures were 15¼.

Mr. HILL. I think in the reading rice was omitted. Rice was included as one of the articles.

Mr. GRIGGS. Very well.

Mr. ADAMSON. Get it right.

Mr. GRIGGS. I am giving the gentleman every opportunity in the world to set himself straight. Five of the articles specified in your list are not named in the Democratic campaign book as being controlled by trusts.

Mr. HILL. Which ones?

Mr. GRIGGS. Cotton flannels, ginghams, certain kinds of glassware, rice, and Ashton salt.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman allow me to read an extract from his own publication?

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. HILL (reading):

Because no trust is mentioned as in control of the price of any article does not mean that the price is not fixed by some trust or association, but only that the compiler of this matter is uncertain if the price is so fixed.

Mr. GRIGGS. That is right.

Mr. HILL. I would ask the gentleman if he did not intend in publishing this list to publish a list showing the tariff duty on each when known, the trusts, combinations, or associations in control of price, by half-year periods from January 1, 1895, to July 1, 1902? And does he now intend to tell the House that some of the articles so included were not the products of trusts after he has put it forth to the country that they were the products of trusts?

Mr. GRIGGS. No.

Mr. HILL. He can make his own explanation.

Mr. GRIGGS. The gentleman was criticising the Democratic campaign book. We do not claim in that book that five of the articles named by you were controlled by trusts. When we were sure of a thing we said so. When we were not sure we left it for the people to ascertain for themselves. That is the truth of it. We did not say these articles were controlled by trusts, because we were not sure. Now, I would like to ask the House why my friend from Connecticut, in his great fairness and in his great generosity to the Democratic party, and to those of us who had to do with the compiling of the campaign book, why he selected this particular list of articles? He took less than one-eighth of the articles on the dutiable list and compared them with all the free list.

Does he consider such conclusions based upon such premises as worth the paper upon which they are written? He could with just as good reason take the following list of articles from the table in our campaign book. He could have taken barbed wire, bar iron, cotton-seed oil, calicoes, linseed oil, lard, meats, salt pork, meats, salt beef——

Mr. HILL. I did take them.

Mr. GRIGGS. Manila rope——

Mr. HILL. I did take them.

Mr. GRIGGS. I said you did not take the entire list and that you might as well have taken this list which I am trying to read.

Prices of 21 articles, all the products of protected trusts.

The average increase in price is over 70 per cent on these dutiable articles, most of which, if not all, are controlled by some trust. Now, gentlemen, you are welcome to all the comfort you can get out of the figures of my friend from Connecticut. In this table which I have just read you, showing an advance of over 70 per cent in price, every article is dutiable, and the price of every one is controlled by some trust. I hope my friend will continue to study the Democratic campaign book.

Mr. HILL. I shall.

Mr. GRIGGS. I believe that the truth will make you free, and if you can ever bring yourself to know the truth I believe that even the gentleman from Connecticut, hidebound as he is, can thus become free.

Now, my friend found one other statement in our book which appeared to be a sweet morsel to be rolled under his tongue. In all this book—which he says he has studied harder than any Democrat, which he says he understands better than any man on the Democratic side of the House, which he knows better than the men who made it and who compiled the statistics—he found one article the price of which was higher in 1896 than it is in 1902. That is wire nails.

He says that before the enactment of the Dingley tariff law, according to Democratic authority, the price of wire nails was $3.15 a keg, and in 1901, after five years of the Dingley tariff bill, and after the organization and full operation of the United States Steel Company, they were $2.10, and have since gone down to $1.85. Presuming that in this quotation he means 1902 when he says 1901, we will see what are the facts. If you will turn to pages 199 and 200 of the campaign book, which my friend always carries in his pocket for reference, you will find the following:

Early in 1895 wire nails were selling at a "base" price of 75 to 80 cents a keg in Pittsburg. In May two associations, one for cut and one for wire nails, got together and put this price up to $1.20. These associations pooled and the wire nail people "contributed financially to enable the Cut Nail Association to keep control of the market, especially in the payment of subsidies to keep idle the large number of cut-nail machines," as the Iron Age of December 3, 1896, tells us. The associations regulated the amount of nails offered for sale each month and the price at which they should be sold. Understandings were had with Canadian manufacturers. Nail-machine makers were subsidized not to sell to those outside the associations. Jobbers who did not cut prices were given rebates.

Prices advanced almost steadily for one year. By May, 1896, wire nails were selling at $2.70 per keg in Chicago and $2.55 in Pittsburg. The pool held together until December, 1896, when prices broke more than 1 cent per pound.

On December 3, 1896, the Iron Age said that high prices of cut and wire nails had reduced consumption from over 9,000,000 kegs in 1891 and 1892 to less than 8,000,000 in 1895, and in 1896 to probably far less than in 1895, notwithstanding the fact that a large amount of nails have been exported into foreign countries at less than half the price that the American public paid for their nails.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman object to being interrupted?

Mr. GRIGGS. The gentleman knows me well enough to know that I do not.

Mr. HILL. I think it would be wise to explain right here as to what that possibly meant, if the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. GRIGGS. I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. HILL (continuing). From a Democratic standpoint.

Mr. GRIGGS. Now, if the gentleman wants to ask me a question I will answer it, but I shall not go to Connecticut for lessons in political wisdom.

Mr. HILL. I was just going to give you the facts—under the Wilson tariff act nails were selling at 79 cents at the manufactory, and in 1897, after the Dingley bill was passed, at 50 cents—as showing from the gentleman's standpoint that that might have made some difference in the price at that time. I was simply showing how under the different tariffs the Republican tariff nails were lower than under the Democratic tariff, and came down from 79 to 50 cents.

Mr. GRIGGS. I know about that.

Mr. LANDIS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GRIGGS. Perhaps I had better get through with the gentleman from Connecticut first. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANDIS. That trust being in existence at that time, as I understand the gentleman to say, from 1892.

Mr. GRIGGS. I did not say there was any trust in existence at that time.

Mr. LANDIS. My understanding was that way.

Mr. GRIGGS. No, sir. That is another one of my friend's mistakes.

Mr. LANDIS. It is true that the trust had control of the output at that time.

Mr. GRIGGS. No; I do not think so. There was an association.

Mr. LANDIS. We will call it an association at that time, but it was a trust organized to control the most of that output.

Mr. GRIGGS. No; it was not organized into any sort of association except by agreement.

Mr. LANDIS. It was an agreement.

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. LANDIS. And is a trust?

Mr. GRIGGS. I did not say so, but it probably was.

Mr. LANDIS. The Democratic party was in absolute control of the legislative and executive branches of this Government at that time, and I would like to ask the gentleman why his party at that time did not enact some sort of legislation to destroy that trust and abrogate such an agreement?

Mr. GRIGGS. In reply, I ask my friend, with all the years that the Republican party had been in power, why they should throw it up now to the Democratic party that it in two years could not do what the Republican party had not done in twenty-five years? If the platform positions and the stump positions of our friends on the other side of the House are true and in good faith, trusts would long since have been controlled.

Mr. LANDIS. In reply I would say this. In your platform of 1892——

Mr. GRIGGS. No, no; my friend.

Mr. LANDIS. You invited this. In your platform of 1892, upon which you elected Grover Cleveland President of the United States and secured control of both Houses of Congress, you pledged your party, not only to enforce the legislation then on the statute book, but to strengthen that enactment by additional legislation. You had absolute control of this Government for two years. You secured control upon that platform; and I would like to ask the gentleman why his party during that time did not write on the statute books of this Republic some sort of law that would handle these trusts.

Mr. GRIGGS. Oh, I can not let the gentleman insert a stump speech in the stomach of my remarks. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANDIS. That is a question I want the gentleman to answer.

Mr. GRIGGS. That is but a repetition of the gentleman's first question. I can no more answer it than the gentleman from Indiana can tell why the Republican party has not accomplished the same thing in twenty-five years' control of this Government.

Mr. LANDIS. The only legislation that has ever been enacted was enacted by the Republican party. You told the people that if you could get control of the Government you would strengthen the legislation.

Mr. GRIGGS. I decline to yield further to the gentleman. I am willing to discuss this question with my friend if he will take his own time, but I am not willing to yield my time to him. We, as you, have promised a great many things to the people of the United States, but we have not had, as you have had, the opportunity for twenty-five years of carrying out those promises.

The President and the Cabinet and, if I understand correctly, that side of the House now claim to believe that a constitutional amendment is necessary in order to control trusts. You found that out after twenty-five years of control of the Government and twenty-five years coincident growth of trusts. This temporary pool to which I have referred lasted only about half a year after the Wilson bill became law, and then it went to smash. The price of wire nails remained low—from $1.35 to $1.50 per keg—until the passage of the Dingley law, when they rose to $3.35 in 1900, the highest price known since the use of wire nails became general. But I am now discussing simply the accuracy of the Democratic campaign book.

It so happens that the first and second date of our tables was at the time when the prices under the temporary pool were the highest. If my friend from Connecticut had taken the prices at any time after they broke in 1896—before the passage of the Dingley Act, in 1897—he would have found them lower than at any time during the four years following the enactment of the Dingley law. Now, according to the Iron Age, a paper which quotes prices monthly, the average price of wire nails for four years from 1894 to 1897, inclusive—the Wilson bill years—was less than $1.70 per keg, while the average price for the four years 1899 to 1902, inclusive, was $2.95, or nearly twice the average of the four years of the Wilson bill.

Mr. HILL. May I ask the gentleman if this information is supplemental to the Democratic campaign book?

Mr. GRIGGS. This is in answer to my friend's speech of last Saturday.

Mr. HILL. I took the figures—as I said at that time, and thought it was unnecessary to go any further—I took them wholly from the Democratic campaign text-book.

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes; and they were absolutely true.

Mr. HILL. That is what I thought.

Mr. GRIGGS. The deductions my friend made were incorrect.

Several of my friends have rushed to the defense of our campaign book and myself from this attack, and I thank them for it, but I must ask the House to indulge me in a little anecdote. A Georgia school-teacher had described to her Sunday-school class the great two-horned, red-eyed, cloven-hoofed, forked-tailed devil going about over the earth seeking bad boys to devour, and after she had finished the lecture, beginning at the head of the class, she said: "Johnnie, aren't you afraid of the great big, red-eyed, forked-tailed devil?" "Yes, 'um." "Aren't you afraid of him, Billy?" "Yes, 'um." "Aren't you afraid of him, Tommy?" "Yes, 'um," until she got to a little, red-headed, freckle-face fellow at the foot of the class. To him she said: "Dick, aren't you afraid of the great, two-horned, red-eyed, forked-tailed devil?" "Yes, 'um; I am scared of that big devil you've been talking about, but if you will trot out a little devil, about my size, I'll give him hell." [Laughter.]

It is possible that I am afraid of some of the big, red-eyed, forked, tailed, scaly-backed, cloven-hoofed devils of the Republican party-Mr. Chairman, but my friend from Connecticut—— [Laughter.]

Just one more word and I am through. Answering the question of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN] if American-made goods were not sold at a lower price to foreigners than to home purchasers, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] said:

> Now, the gentleman has asked me a question fairly, whether I do not know that some articles are sold abroad for less than they are sold at home. Yes, I do know it; but I know that there are commercial and business reasons for it; and, on the other hand, I know that there are many articles sold abroad at higher prices than they are sold at home, but there are commercial and business reasons for that.

The gentleman from Connecticut admits that some articles are sold cheaper abroad than here, but claims that some are sold higher abroad than here. That is true also; but many—in fact, most—of the articles exported from the United States are sold at lower prices abroad than they are sold here. Why? Because they are sheltered here by the tariff, which enables the manufacturer to make such prices as he sees fit, as a tax on the thrift of the American people, while in order to build up his trade abroad he sells the same goods at lower prices in foreign countries.

Mr. Schwab, president of the steel trust, a man who is better acquainted with this question than almost any other, in his testimony before the Industrial Commission admitted that American manufacturers were in the habit of selling goods cheaper to foreigners than to our own people.

But I have something better than this. Here is the price list of the Exporters and Importers' Journal for May, 1902. This list was photographed and put into our campaign book, showing the discounts on goods shipped to foreign countries. We had great trouble in securing this list, but we finally got it, and it is photographed in this campaign book. Now, what do we find? You will find on pages 171–172 of this Democratic campaign book a list of articles with the percentage of difference in price to foreigners compared with the American purchasers. This list is based on the figures in the Exporters and Importers' Journal and the special discount sheet accompanying it.

I will name just a few articles and give the difference in the price to Americans and foreigners. Borax, 210 per cent; the difference in the price of axle grease to Americans and to foreigners, 20 per cent; the difference in the price of meat choppers, 38 per cent; the difference in the price of wire nails to the people of the United States and the people of foreign countries is 58 per cent; the difference in the price of malleable-iron rakes, 27 per cent; the difference in iron, 25 per cent; the difference in the price of sausage stuffers to foreigners and the people of the United States, 20 per cent; the difference in the price of saws, an article of common need, of necessity to the workingman, the difference in price is 62 per cent. In every case the difference in price named here is in favor of the foreigner and against the home purchaser. There are many others which I have not the time to name. Republicans do not care to discuss this question of lower prices to foreigners. They can not meet it, and they must admit it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman wants to understand fully and completely the theory upon which this Government was established, that of the greatest good to the greatest number, I would advise him not only to carry the Democratic campaign book with him in his pocket during the day, but to sleep with it under his pillow at night. I would advise him to take it early in the morning and study it until late in the evening, to study it through the hours of the night, and finally, possibly, it may get into the head of my friend from Connecticut that the Democratic theory of equal rights to all and special privileges to none is the theory upon which this Government was established and must stand if it is to endure. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I print as an appendix a table of home and export prices of American-manufactured goods.

APPENDIX A.

The Republicans continue to tell the people that our protected trusts do not sell their products cheaper to foreigners than to Americans, or that if they sometimes do so it is only to get rid of a surplus or to keep the mills running.

Mr. Charles M. Schwab, the president of the billion-dollar steel trust, told the Industrial Commission in May, 1901, that all kinds of manufactured goods were always sold much lower for export than in the home market.

Mr. John W. Gates, of the steel and wire trust, told the Industrial Commission in November, 1899, that steel and wire goods were sold lower to foreigners.

Mr. A. B. Farquhar, of York, Pa., one of our largest manufacturers of agricultural implements, says: "Certainly our manufactures are sold much lower abroad."

An official Government publication under the present Republican Administration—Report of the Bureau of Statistics on Commerce and Finance for August, 1900—admits that American steel rails and plates are sold in foreign markets far below the price charged here.

The Iron Age the Oil, Paint, and Drug Reporter, and other trade papers frequently contain statements and quotations showing the great difference between export and home prices. Numerous letters in the Iron Age during the last two years from manufacturers and dealers have complained of the fact that some manufacturers still treat Hawaiians as foreigners and give them the benefit of export prices, although our tariff wall now extends around Hawaii, and there is no good reason why Hawaiians, who now live under our flag, should not be compelled to pay protected trust prices. But the trusts understand their business and are weaning our new Pacific island citizens gradually from low foreign to high home prices. In the meantime enterprising dealers on the Pacific coast are buying goods in Hawaii and bringing them back to undersell the manufacturers who shipped the goods to Hawaii. A similar condition of affairs exists as to Porto Rico, more recently annexed to this trust-ridden country.

But this and much more similar evidence is insufficient to convince the Republican politicians who are unwilling to be convinced. The people will never learn the facts as to export prices from Republicans.

Of course the protected manufacturers advertise their very low export prices in price lists and journals which circulate only in foreign countries. They try to prevent any copies of such journals from reaching our people and have been most successful in their efforts to keep us in ignorance of the exact facts.

When the Democratic Congressional committee wished to advertise, offering a reward of $100 for one of these export-price journals, the advertisement was refused by nearly all the leading newspapers in New York City. The editors did not wish to offend the trusts. The New York World published the offer and the committee at last succeeded in obtaining several export journals, and the Democratic campaign book contains 15 pages of matter photographed from these journals. The prices there quoted, although they are retail prices or prices for small lots of goods, are far below any prices procurable in this country.

The following list is from the Democratic campaign book:

The export prices on heavy steel goods like rails, billets, structural materials, etc., are not contained in the table, partly for the reason that the present home demand in these lines is such that our manufacturers are not just now bidding for export business. They are, however, filling orders at prices from 20 to 40 per cent below home prices, and are undoubtedly securing some new orders, especially in bridge material. It should be remembered that the pools and price agreements on rails, billets, sheets, plates, structural work, etc., are not in force on export goods, and our manfacturers usually compete freely in foreign countries. The blessings of competition are still enjoyed by foreigners even when dealing with protected manufacturers.

The export prices of barb and plain wire and of wire nails are taken from the South African Market Report of February 1, 1902, issued by Arkell & Douglas, of New York, DOUGLAS being a Republican Congressman. Two other export journals quote about the same prices.

The present price of our borax in England is obtained from Mr. Ernest L. Fleming, a manufacturer and importer and exporter of borax, soda, etc., of Wareham, England. The duty of 5 cents per pound enables the borax trust to charge 7½ cents here, while selling freely at 2½ cents in England.

The prices on wire rope, sold here for three and one-half times the export price, are obtained from the quoted prices (with discounts) of the trust here and from foreign manufacturers and importing dealers. The tariff amounts to about 100 per cent. An explanation of the possibility of this great difference is given in the campaign book, which discusses the bulldozing methods of the trust, which contributed $100,000 to the Republican campaign fund of 1896.

The tin-plate trust has been for nearly two years selling plates to the Southern Cotton Oil Company and other exporting manufacturers of canned goods at about $1 per box below the regular prices. It offered to meet the Welsh prices (about $1.50 per box of 100 pounds below the American price, the duty being $1.50 per box) on an order for 1,500,000 boxes from the Standard Oil Company if the workingmen would accept a 25 per cent reduction in wages. The men voted last August not to accept the reduction and about half of the tin-plate mills are now idle. The tariff on tin plates has cost this country over $100,000,000 during the last twelve years. As soon as the manufacturers could produce as cheaply as foreigners they got together and formed a trust and put up the price from $2.80 per box in 1898 to $4.84 in 1900. It is now $4.19.

The ingratitude of the protected trusts and manufacturers is monumental. They accept charity from us until they become strong, then they utilize to the fullest the power which the tariff gives them to charge us exorbitant prices and get saucy and say: "What are you going to do about it?"

It is up to the voter to cut the tariff ropes which bind him while the protected trusts rifle his pockets.

APPENDIX B.

SPEECH OF CONGRESSMAN-ELECT ROBERT BAKER AT CREDIT MEN'S ASSOCIATION DINNER, JANUARY 29.

As I am to speak to the toast, "Should trusts be regulated," let me say at the outset that if they are not regulated, or rather if the causes which produce them are not removed, then this and similar associations might as well disband and their members seek other avocations, if then obtainable.

For the trust principle and that under which credit men's associations thrive are directly antagonistic and can not both endure.

As I understand it, credit men's associations are an organized police force to guard the property of manufacturers and merchants from the depredations of those who would obtain that property without returning its full equivalent. Such associations exemplify the principle of voluntary cooperation, while the trusts are predatory in their operation. The aim of these associations is, of course, the complete elimination from the mercantile world of the fraud and the swindler. Should the trusts reach their logical development there will be no need of credit men's associations, as no one will be able to purchase goods except on the terms and conditions the trusts impose, payment for goods previously obtained being a condition precedent to securing more.

Before we can determine whether trusts should be regulated we must first discover the cause of trusts, no intelligent treatment of the question being possible without having first discovered their cause. Briefly their cause is found in laws which interfere with competition. Whether laws entirely abrogate or merely impede the natural flow of trade and the natural production of wealth, to the extent they do so operate they induce the formation of trusts to take advantage of these obstructions. The aim of the trust is the obliteration of competition, and to the extent to which that end is attained is the trust perfected. It will, no doubt, be said that no such absolute condition exists in any industry; therefore no trust exists. Even if this be true, and I doubt it as to at least one industry, progress may have already advanced so far toward that final consummation as to make it to all intents and purposes a fact in certain industries.

It is probably unnecessary to point out in such a presence as this, among men who are important cogs in machines directed by acute minds (an acuteness induced and sharpened by the competitive system), that if trusts do exist they must have had their origin in conditions unlike those in which the business they represent are carried on. Even where not fully attained, the genesis of the trust is found in monopoly. There are four primary causes which produce monopolies. They are the tariff; railroad rebates or discriminations; patents; the private ownership of natural resources. No trust can exist without one of these; it is insecure unless it has the second or fourth; but it reaches its highest form and becomes impregnable where all four exist. Each of these causes is an abrogation of the principles upon which this Government is founded, which asserts the existence of inalienable rights, among them being the equal right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness

Neither liberty nor happiness is possible to those who are the victims of a trust buttressed by all four elements. If the people retain a part of the liberty and some of their happiness, it is because the trusts as yet control but a part of the necessaries of life. The more that trusts are organized and perfected the more the lives of the people are menaced, their liberty restricted, and the less happiness is possible to them. We may not fully discern all that is involved in the consummation of the trust idea, but all who study the subject are agreed that it will gather force and momentum and go on to its logical conclusion—an all-powerful trust controlling other trusts—unless the causes which create them are removed, so that individual initiative can again be exercised. It is for such associations as this to determine on which side their influence is to be cast—for the extension and perpetuation of the present trust-producing conditions or a return to conditions of freedom.

We hear much of "publicity" as a cure for the evils of the trusts. So far as this is a sincere demand it is based upon an entire misconception of the proper functions of government. Governments are instituted among men for the purpose of preventing aggressions upon the weak by the powerful. But the government itself has no moral right to be an aggressor any more than it has to permit aggressions by others.

Whence comes the right to demand that the Government throw out an universal drag net to reach all who engage in interstate commerce, to pry into the affairs of all who sell goods across an imaginary line, or even to compel combinations of capital to expose the inner workings of their business? Who is to determine, in advance of the exercise of this detective power, which are and which are not trusts?

It is well known that the manufacturers and merchants who engage in interstate commerce far exceed those who do not. Is all private business to be subject to an official espionage because a few rob the people? If the demand is based upon the presumed fact that somebody has bought stocks which they now believe to be inflated, then I answer that it is none of the business of the Government to compel one party to a contemplated transaction to expose his affairs to the other. If the evidence of value is not satisfactory and conclusive, then he need not buy.

If one of the parties to the transaction is so reckless of his wealth that he is willing to exchange it for a share of stock of whose value he is ignorant, it is no more the function of the Government to guarantee him against loss than it would be to declare a purchase of goods from a mercantile house should be null and void because the anticipation of profit by the buyer had not been realized. If there had been misrepresentation of the property or earning power such as constitutes fraud, the courts are open to the injured party for redress; but if he will gamble on the stock exchange he must take his chance with other gamblers that the cards have not been stacked by those who control the pack. There is no obligation for him to engage in this any more than other kind of gambling.

"PUBLICITY."

The demand for publicity as a remedy for the oppressions of the trusts would be comical if the matter were not so tragic to many concerned. We are told that the Government should require schedules showing in detail all the property owned by a trust, so that we may know whether the capitalization is excessive or not. Who is to determine that ever-disputed question of value? Upon what is it to be based? Is it to be the cost of reproduction of the plants or is it to be earning power? If the total capitalization is to be only the cost of reproducing the plants, then there will have to be a startling scaling down of book values and a corresponding reduction in the face value of the stock. But it will not make a particle of difference as to its salable value, which depends upon the average opinion of its earning power.

Even if the courts were to decree that no more stock should be issued than would represent the cost of reproducing the plants it would not affect its aggregate selling price, so long as there was no interference with the power of the trust to exact exorbitant prices due to its possession of monopolistic powers. The steel trust might be directed to scale down its share issue to $1,000,000—the probable value of its plants after deducting the face of the bonds—yet that $1,000,000 of stock would have the same earning capacity and would sell for as high an aggregate price as the present issue.

If anyone doubts this let him observe the price of the shares of the New River Water Company, of London, selling, if I remember aright, at a quarter of a million dollars a share, and which is dealt in in one-hundredth parts of a share. The value of a tollgate on a highway to its possessors is not the cost of reproducing the house in which the toll gatherer resides, but is determined by the number of people who use the highway and therefore must pass the tollgate. So it is with a trust; the value of its stock is not the cost of reproduction of its plants, but is due chiefly to the letters of marque which have been issued to it to levy toll upon an entire nation. Publicity will not deprive any of them of their tariff privileges, of their patents, of railroad rebates or discriminations, nor of their monopolization of oil, iron ore, copper, coal, or borax beds, and therefore will not reduce the toll they collect, consequently the aggregate value of their privileges will not be reduced.

You can protect the public from being fleeced not by reducing their capitalization, but by abolishing their privileges. When they sell goods abroad (including railroad and ocean freights and insurance) at two-thirds the price they charge for the same in this country, you get a glimpse of the privileges which they have capitalized, and incidentally how much the American people are being robbed. In the case of the two most gigantic corporations—the Standard Oil Company and the United States Steel Corporation—the privileges they possess are partly national and partly State. They are among the largest beneficiaries of the tariff system, but a large part of their capitalization is based upon the ownership of immense areas of land wherein their raw material is deposited.

Because nine-tenths of these deposits are held out of use the States in which they are located (following our own idiotic policy of permitting the forestallers of land to almost entirely escape taxation) do not assess them at even 1 per cent of their value, the consequence being the output is restricted and the consumers are charged all the traffic will bear. If they were assessed at their full value and taxed regardless of whether used or not, it would not pay to hold immense tracts of coal, iron, copper, oil, and other lands out of use, the result would be a larger production with its consequent reduction of price. There might be less private building of libraries and endowment of universities, but there would be a more equitable distribution of wealth, prosperity and happiness would be more general because most of the wealth would be retained by those who create it, and I have no doubt the libraries and universities would be provided—but out of the public treasury.

If any of us lived in a region where wolves abound, we should laugh to scorn the suggestion, however high the source from which it came, to appoint a commission to go out and examine the age, size, and strength of the wolves' teeth; and that would be no more farcical than the assertion that "publicity" is the remedy for the trust evil. If we do not desire to kill the wolves, let us at least pull their teeth, so that they can no longer ravage our flocks. And we shall pull their teeth the moment we deprive them of their privileges. Then they will thrive only to the extent that they perform the useful function of producing and distributing more economically than their competitors.

The evil of the trusts is not to be found in the secrecy of their management nor in the ignorance of the public as to their internal affairs, only to the extent that secrecy covers payments for political favors, and he is a simple-minded citizen who imagines that any regulations, however drastic, prohibiting such payments can be effective so long as we permit these immensely valuable favors to be conferred, whether they take the form of tariffs, railroad rebates or discriminations, or ridiculously low assessments of their lands.

Those who control these corporations will find a way to place political parties and political chiefs under financial obligations, even if they have to donate the money out of their own pockets. A tip from the inside when to bet the stock will go up or down is a very simple matter, but it has brought fortunes to those who heeded it. But there are other more subtle but not less effective ways—ways that are more dangerous to the public well being than even direct bribery. How many will resist the bait of the presidency of a great corporation, with the fabulous salaries that now attach to such a position, when dangled before their eyes, to be theirs at the end of their official term, provided they are good?

Publicity does not touch nor even suggest the real causes of trusts. It but excites the inner mirth of those who are becoming immensely rich through their operation, however much in public they may fume about the danger to "business interests" that would follow the passage of such laws. Any regulation to be effective must strike at the root of the evil, which is monopoly. If you are unwilling to attack the cause, then I recommend that the matter be dropped from your thoughts, at the same time giving serious thought to the question of what occupation will be open to the members of your association when the trust idea has reached its logical conclusion, the elimination of competition from all business, with its direction of each class of business from one central headquarters, and its turning adrift of those who have either displayed less than the highest order of ability or have not ingratiated themselves with the powers that control the industry in which they were previously engaged.

Where talent is then to find scope for its display, except at the very top, I leave you to imagine. If with that talent you retain traces of the most boasted possession of Americans—independence—you had better not seek employment by any of the trusts when a more perfect organization of industry has been effected. If, however, you are content to be a mere cog in a great wheel, asking no questions, bowing submissive to the powers that control, trusting in your old age—in the days of your failing powers—that you will be accorded a pittance out of their abundant treasury, then not merely shut your eyes to the oppressions being practiced, but prove your claim to favorable consideration later on by asserting that trusts are not merely harmless, but beneficent associations of capital; that it is only the unsuccessful, the weak and the slothful, the demagogue and the anarchist who rail against them, and, like the Pharisee of old, "you pride yourself that you are not like unto them."

Great stress is laid, and no doubt justly, upon the fact that certain of the trusts, notably the Standard Oil Company, has made it a practice to lower the price of its product at certain places almost to the vanishing point, with the intent of first driving out its competitors and then raising the price so as not only to recoup itself for the temporary loss, but to enable it to pay big dividends upon its stock. If this company had not possessed some of the special privileges I have enumerated it could not have adopted any such policy. To do so would have meant a permanent loss had it not possessed one or more of these privileges. The moment it put the price higher than the competitive price new competitors would have sprung up, induced to go into business by the abnormal prices obtainable, but possible competitors were deterred from doing so, knowing that discriminations were constantly made in their favor, and they could not compete where the cards were stacked against them by the railroads.

No grocer, baker, or butcher would think of attempting to secure a monopoly in his town or city by first lowering prices so as to drive out competitors and then raising them so as to recoup himself for the previous loss. And why? Because possessing no special privileges, he knows that should he attempt to recover such loss by boosting prices others would enter the business and he would have to start all over again. And so it is with all combinations of capital not possessing special privileges. No matter how large their capital they can only prosper to the extent they are ably and economically managed, and while economical management may be a factor in trust profits, it is the smallest factor and is not to be compared with the monopoly element.

The Standard Oil Company did not attain its position as the industrial octopus because publicity has not disclosed the number and structural value of its plants, or the prices its oil was sold for at different places. It dominates and controls the oil business and its masters have absorbed other large industries because of its infamous conspiracy with the Pennsylvania and other railroads, under which for years its competitors were charged three times as high a freight rate, one-half of the excess being given to the Standard Oil Company. History records no more scandalous transaction, no more shameful perversion of governmental powers, and no amount of publicity can prevent like results, unless we strike at the root of the evil—the use of governmental functions to favor some and oppress others.

But we are told that is ancient history and is no longer practiced. Gentlemen, the leopard has not changed his spots. It may be that such brazen discriminations are not practiced now. If so, it is because the culprits have discovered more skillful and cunning ways of accomplishing the same ends. One of these methods is for the trust or other favored shipper to wait until his stock of goods at some important point is almost exhausted, then to secretly arrange with the railroad that on an agreed-upon date the freight rate on that class of goods shall be slashed nearly to zero. In preparation therefor it accumulates its goods and at the agreed time ships sufficient to replenish its stock. Immediately this is done, and almost before its competitors are aware of the reduced rate, the railroad announces a restoration of the old rate, offering some plausible excuse, such as an error, the practical effect being the same as if a discriminating rate had been made in the interest of the trust.

The power of the United States Steel Corporation does not lie in its huge capitalization, even if it were all genuine capital and not three-fourths water. There is an undoubted economy in combining large amounts of capital under one management. To the extent that it represents a combination of many plants working in unison under one general direction it is not harmful. But if it were nothing more than this it would not have been capitalized at more than a third of its present figure, our modern financial magician would never have undertaken its organization, nor would anyone have received stock valued at scores of millions of dollars for acting as a clearing house for the exchange of the pieces of paper representing the ownership of its various plants.

If it possessed no special privileges, if it did not in part usurp governmental functions, it could not last a day; so top-heavy would be the mass of water in its securities that it would flood the owners and the whole combination would collapse, as it would not have the power to exact extortionate prices, and therefore would be unable to pay dividends after paying interest on its bonds. Every dollar of dividend that has been or will be paid upon its stock is an enforced tribute from the American people, simply showing the enormous value of its special privileges, its tariff bounties, its patent rights, its railroad privileges, and, above all, its land-ownership privileges—for its plants could be duplicated for less than the face of the bonds.

To those who assert "publicity" is the cure of the trust evil, I ask, How will publicity lessen, in the slightest degree, the tariff bounties, the railroad privileges, the patent rights, or loosen the monopolization of oil, coal, or iron-ore deposits by the Standard Oil Company or the United States Steel Corporation?

Every freight discrimination is an abrogation of the right to equal service to which all are entitled, this equality being involved in the very grant of the franchise under which the railroad operates. Not even so corrupt and boss-ridden a legislature as that of Pennsylvania would have ever dared to grant a franchise for a railroad if those applying for it had even suggested the possibility of varying freight rates being charged to different shippers. All who have been parties to such discriminations either as grantors or beneficiaries should be rigorously prosecuted, no matter how rich or powerful they may have already become. The vigorous prosecution of even one of these millionaire malefactors would do much to restore a respect for law among the mass of the people, and would, of course, prevent any repetition of such practices.

There is scarcely a monopoly that does not get some of its power to plunder the people from these freight-rate discriminations. State railroad commissions may exist, interstate commerce commissions may have their powers broadened and extended, but these practices will not stop nor this form of robbery be thereby curtailed. Nothing short of national ownership of the railroads can secure equal service to all shippers.

Public ownership and operation of the railroads will destroy some and curb all trusts, but the final solution of the trust problem will only come when the people abolish the most fundamental of all monopoly, the monopolization of land. Then and not till then will free competition really exist and men find their reward determined by the value of the service they render to their fellow-men.

Eulogy on the Life and Character of the late Hon. Joshua S. Salmon.

HON. WILLIAM SULZER,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 8, 1903.

The House having under consideration the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That, in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted, the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of Hon. JOSHUA S. SALMON, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of New Jersey.

"Resolved, That, as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a faithful and distinguished public servant, the House, at the conclusion of the memorial proceedings of this day, shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk be, and is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased"—

Mr. SULZER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: JOSHUA S. SALMON, a member of this House, died most unexpectedly on the 6th of last May, in the prime of life, in the noon time of his usefulness, in the zenith of his labors, in the fruition of his fame, in the midst of his busy career, loved and respected and honored by all who knew him.

In his sad and sudden death our country lost one of its noblest and foremost citizens; the House of Representatives one of its ablest and most efficient members; the Commonwealth of New Jersey, his native State, one of her purest and most patriotic sons; the sorrowing and grief-stricken and inconsolable family a tender and a loving husband and a kind and an affectionate father; and humanity all the world over a true, a sincere, and a sympathetic brother, who loved his fellow-man, lived to do good in every walk of life, and in all seasons struggled to make mankind better and grander and happier.

It was my good fortune to know well this kindly, genial, considerate, sunshiny, generous man. He was my friend for years, and I shall miss him more and more as the years come and go. In the affections of those who truly knew him his loss is irreparable, and has left a void that never can be filled.

It is fitting that we who knew him best should on this Sabbath day pay tribute to the memory of this true and brave and gentle man, who saw the right, and with a heart for any fate always dared to do his duty. He is with us no more, but in the recollection of his many gracious acts and kindly deeds and admirable traits of character, that will always live and be his greatest monument, he has left to us all an example of true manhood that we should ever endeavor to follow and always strive to emulate.

Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time.

It has been said, Mr. Speaker, that no man is perfect. This is true, but in many respects Mr. SALMON was, in my opinion, an ideal man. He never indulged in censure. He was no fault-finder.

I never heard him complain. If he could not commend he did not condemn. Where he could not praise he held his peace. He knew the art of silence. He was considerate of others, ever gracious, and always courteous. He could not be mean or small or uncharitable; it was not in his nature. His mind was broad and liberal and cosmopolitan. He loved nature, the beautiful, his home, his family, his friends, and his country. He had a great heart, noble impulses, and a sympathetic nature.

He had a lovable disposition and an attractive manner. He measured up to the sublime heights of a man, and typified in his personality the true American. Like Lincoln, he saw good in all things, and had malice toward none, charity for all. He was a commoner—a man of the people—a true Democrat in the best and broadest significance of the word.

He hated cant, despised hypocrisy, laid firm hold on the everlasting truth, and did not believe that might made right. He stood for equal rights to all, special privileges to none. He was honest in thought, honest in word, honest in deed. He had the rectitude of the rocks, the faith of the surging stream rushing oceanward, the hope of the summer's sun welcoming the harvest time. He died full of honors in the service of his country—a faithful public servant, mourned by all who knew him, and by thousands who only knew him by his works in the vineyard of human endeavor.

None knew him but to love him,
Nor named him but to praise.

And yet he was a modest man, dreading praise, not blame, and asking no reward but the self-consciousness of having done his duty in every avenue of industry to the best of his ability—a simple, sincere, sagacious man.

Mr. Speaker, on the 2d day of February, 1846, JOSHUA S. SALMON was born, near Mount Olive, Morris County, in the grand old State of New Jersey. He grew to be one of her favorite sons. He was a studious boy and received a thorough education. He attended the seminaries at Schooleys Mountain, N. J., and at Charlottesville, N. Y.

Subsequently he graduated from the Albany Law School with high honors, and in 1873 was duly admitted to practice in all the courts of the State of New York. But he loved his native State and longed to be back to the scenes of his childhood, so in 1875 he returned to the county of his birth and settled at Boonton.

In 1877 he was elected to the legislature and served with much distinction. He was prosecutor of the pleas for Morris County from April, 1893, to April, 1898, and was elected a member of the Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Congresses. He was a well-equipped lawyer, a zealous legislator, a great worker, a man of affairs, and an indefatigable plodder in the march of human progress.

The best efforts of his life in Congress were spent with the tedious work in the committees of which he was a painstaking and efficient member—the all-important committee work in the committee room—the work that is so seldom seen, so little known to the public, and in most cases wholly unappreciated by the people, but which is, after all, the backbone and the real and the lasting work that lays the foundation for good laws and permanent legislation. Here our colleague seemed to be in his element and was unexcelled; here our friend did his chosen work day in and day out, faithfully and in his careful, conscientious, and methodical way.

Mr. Speaker, our friend is with us no more. He has crossed the river of life. He has gone to his long home—that undiscovered country. He fought the good fight; he kept the faith, and his work for the people will shine brighter and brighter as the years pass on and by until it becomes his lasting monument—more enduring than marble and brass.

We mourn our loss; we sympathize with his beloved family and console them and ourselves with the knowledge that our colleague will ever live in the grateful hearts of those he left behind; and to do this is not to die. He will live in the undying memory of his great works, his good deeds, his kindly words, his open-handed generosity, his loving kindness, his human sympathies, his love for mankind, and his noble-hearted charities. In all these will he live until memory is gone and time shall be no more; but who can wish for a better or a greater or a more enduring monument? Let us strive to follow his example and struggle to emulate his virtues, and let us not forget that—

The memory of good deeds will ever stay
A lamp to light us on the darkened way,
A music to the ear on clamoring street.
A cooling well amid the noonday heat,
A scent of green boughs blown through narrow walls,
A feel of rest when quiet evening falls.

Army Appropriation Bill.

OF

HON. CLAUDE A. SWANSON,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, January 13, 1903.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 16567) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904—

Mr. SWANSON said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I did not intend to participate in this debate until I learned to-day that a resolution will be taken up to-morrow giving a rebate or to suspend tariff duties on coal, and under the rules of the House no debate would be given upon it, practically, when it comes before the House.

I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the joint debate between the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Missouri. As it was a mathematical debate, and an estimate as to the chances pro and con of the Republican party and the Democratic party in the next election, I tried to be impartial and determined to sit as judge with these two mathematicians to determine the possibilities of the two parties in the great national election. I weighed the matter carefully, having listened to the evidence and arguments, and I must decide that I am satisfied, in an impartial way, that in 1904 the Democrats will win the Presidency from the statement made by the gentleman from Missouri.

But, Mr. Chairman, great as have been the issues that have been met in the past, greater are those which are to be met in the future. I remember when I first came to Congress, in 1892, the Republicans had only 90 members on the other side. I remember in the next House we had been defeated, and we only had 90 Democrats on this side. The American people had decided the issues made up between the two great parties.

Mr. Chairman, there is an issue pending before the American people to-day that the Republican party has cowardly tried to evade. Resolutions of different State conventions have been ignored practically. They endeavor to hush up, to silence, and to suppress the issue, and that great issue, which will determine the Presidential election, is whether the Dingley law shall be changed or whether there shall be a reform in the tariff or not.

We witnessed a remarkable spectacle in this House. In the great State of Iowa, rock-ribbed Republican, Republican to the core, a great agricultural State, a State that has been as true to Republicanism and protection as any in this Union, among the Republicans was a heresy cry. In the great State of Iowa the Republican governor, Mr. Cummins, determined that the Dingley Act was iniquitous, was exacting, was a protector of the trusts, was imposing upon the great purchasing and producing masses of the American people. He reached the conclusion that that bill ought to be reformed, that the tariff impositions and duties ought to be changed. The Republican party in Iowa met in State convention. That convention declared for a reform of the tariff duties, that the tariff act, so far as it sheltered trusts and combinations, so far as it was against the producing and consuming masses of the American people, should be reformed.

The distinguished Speaker of this House did not agree with the platform of the Republican party of the great State of Iowa. He disagreed with it, and when the issue was made as to whether the Dingley Act was sacred and whether these tariff duties should be rewritten by the American Congress, or the American people through its Congress, he could not agree with his own constituents. He could not agree with what is known as the Iowa heresy by those who believe in "standing pat," and rather than stand here and advocate reform or change of these duties he abdicated the great powers of the Speaker and the power of being a Representative in Congress and retired to private life. The people of his district and the great State of Iowa, rather than surrender their convictions and their views and what they conceive to be in the interest of the great American people, determined to adhere to their platform.

Now, I want to say this. You Republicans may try to suppress it, you Republicans may retreat reluctantly, you may try to get rid of tariff reform, you may try to cover it up with political prejudice, but the great American people will rise in their might against the Dingley exclusions and exactions and say that they shall be eliminated and a reform tariff bill passed. We had that issue in the Ways and Means Committee. A reluctant, slow, calm, quiet retreat before the American people determined to reform the iniquities of the tariff, determined to reform the high rate of the Dingley Act. What is to be proposed for our discussion to-morrow? Whether the Dingley Act is sacred or not.

The gentleman from Ohio has shown that the Republican party has won this House. How did they win it? Why, the gentleman from Ohio when he went before his constituents in his district went with the statement he made upon the floor of this House. He said that he was a man that did not believe that the schedules and duties of the Dingley Act were sacred, and he for one would vote to change them when the American people demanded, wanted, or needed them. He was not a man who "stood pat," according to the Hanna idea. He distinctly stated on the floor of this House that he did not have any fetish admiration for the schedules in the Dingley Act. The Republicans of Iowa indorse a change. The Republicans of Wisconsin, in a great many Congressional districts, stood by Mr. BABCOCK and said there should be changes in the Dingley Act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say this: How was it, when the Dingley Act was prepared, that the schedules were made higher than ever before in the history of this country? The author of that act, by the reciprocity provisions in it, provided for a 20 per cent reduction in all the schedules in that act. Section 4 provides that within two years reciprocity treaties may be entered into with any nation in the world, by which there shall be a reduction of 20 per cent on all the schedules of that act.

Mr. PAYNE. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. SWANSON. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the rates in the Dingley Act were fixed and passed by the House months before the fourth section, providing for the reduction by reciprocity, was put in in the Senate?

Mr. SWANSON. That act had been printed and the evidence of it had been before the country, and there was such an indignation throughout the country against the high schedules that you Republicans provided for a reduction by reciprocity of 20 per cent to make the country acquiesce in it.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, the gentleman is changing his ground.

Mr. SWANSON. Not at all. I want to say this, that the rates in the Dingley Act had been originally fixed in the House. It did not then provide for the 20 per cent reduction on the schedules in it. The indignation of this country was so great against it that I do not believe its passage could have been secured, even in a Republican House, except for the reciprocity provision which provided for the 20 per cent reduction.

Mr. PAYNE. Do I understand the gentleman to say that there was any provision in the Dingley Act in this House for the reduction of 20 per cent in the way of reciprocity?

Mr. SWANSON. I want to say that at its final passage, after it had been added on in the Senate, the indignation against the high duties provided by the bill became known throughout the country, and you people, as you always do, surrendered and agreed to this provision for a reciprocity with a 20 per cent reduction on all the schedules.

Mr. PAYNE. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. SWANSON. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Is not the gentleman drawing entirely upon his imagination for his facts when he says that on account of the indignation in the country at the high rates of the Dingley Act, that amendment was put on in the Senate?

Mr. SWANSON. The Senate, as it always does in a matter like that, after the House had tested the pulse of public opinion, put that provision in and made it palatable to the American people. I want to say further that I do not believe the Republican party in this country could have passed the Dingley Act if you had not promised them reciprocity to the extent of a 20 per cent reduction at the end of two years.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say in answer to the gentleman that there was no indignation, that there was nothing but approval of the Dingley Act by the Republican journals in this country and in this House from the time it was first introduced down to the date of the agreement of the House to the report of the committee of conference and its final passage.

Mr. SWANSON. The gentleman's difficulty to hear the voice of the country is greater than his difficulty to hear in this House. I want to say, and I say now, that there was indignation at the very high rates of the Dingley Act, the highest that were ever imposed by any tariff law in this country, and the Senate put on that reciprocity provision, the fourth section, which provided for a 20 per cent reduction on every schedule in it in accordance with the sentiment of this country. We knew it was excessive, we knew it was exclusive, and knew it was the only way for this country to survive. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York, why did you put in your tariff law, why did you put in the Dingley Act a provision that permitted a reciprocity treaty for a reduction of 20 per cent within two years on all the provisions in it if it was not in response to the sentiment of the country?

Mr. PAYNE. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia that that provision was put in the bill by the Senate. The first time the members of the House came in contact with it was in a committee of conference. The Republicans of that committee resisted that fourth section, resisted it to the very last end of the conference, and they only consented to it because the Senate conferees told them that their idea of the reduction of 20 per cent was upon noncompeting articles not produced in this country, and they did not believe any Republican administration would ever negotiate a treaty or make a reduction of 20 per cent or 10 per cent of these rates upon industries in this country which needed protection. [Applause.]

Mr. SWANSON. That is a fair sample of the way that the Republican party deals with the country in connection with the tariff. The reciprocity provision as it left the House was limited to articles that were not produced in this country. The provision of the Senate did not limit it to anything, but provided for a 20 per cent reduction on every duty in the bill. And I want to say that the Senate yielded because the country would not sustain the excessive rates of the Dingley Act, except with the hope that after a certain time a 20 per cent reduction would be made on various schedules.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us look at what the Dingley Act has done. The gentleman talks a great deal about the Dingley Act. But we must not forget that conditions change in other countries as well as our own from time to time. Let us see how, since the passage of that act, the conditions have changed in connection with the trade and commerce and general business of the United States. A short while before the passage of that act there had been elected in Canada a ministry favorable to trade relations with the United States—favorable to the granting of lower duties to this country—so that the products of our trade and commerce might enter the Canadian market upon reciprocal advantageous terms. Those terms were scorned by the Republican party, in power, and instead of having the trade advantages in Canada that we ought to have under a fair, just system of trade relations, Canada to-day gives a 30 per cent preferential to Great Britain, while American goods and manufactures—the products of American industry—have to meet British goods in the Canadian market at the disadvantage of the 30 per cent preferential given to British goods.

What has been the relation of our trade with Germany since the passage of the Dingley Act? The greatest market for American produce, the greatest market in the world for the productions of the farmers of this country, next to Great Britain, has been Germany. But Germany has recently passed a new tariff bill; and what does it do? You can understand why there is rebellion in Iowa, why there will be rebellion in Nebraska, why there will be rebellion in all the great agricultural sections of this country, when the effect of these new conditions is realized. Let us see what Germany does to-day, as affecting American farmers and other American interests, under the new tariff bill.

Under the old law of Germany we simply paid 23 cents a bushel tariff duty on our wheat. Under the new law Germany requires us to pay 49 cents on every bushel of American wheat sold in that country. Under the old law Germany was a great market for American corn. That market was increasing each year. Under the old law which existed prior to the Dingley Act we paid only 10 cents a bushel on the corn we exported to Germany. But to-day every bushel of American corn sold in Germany must pay a duty of 24 cents. Under the old law in Germany American apples entered free. That country was a large and profitable market for American apples. To-day, under the new law of Germany, the duty is $2.40 on every 220 pounds of American fruit imported into Germany.

What was until recently the great market for American meat and American bacon? Germany. From our importations into that country there came prosperity to our American farms and American homes. Under the old law the duty was $1.84 per 100 pounds. Under the new law it is $3.90 per 100 pounds.

I could occupy your time until sundown in showing you the discrimination which is now made against American products exported to Germany under the new tariff law of that country, enacted in retaliation for our Dingley Act.

Take Canada; and there also we find the spirit of retaliation. Take Russia; to protect the sugar trust—to prevent simply the introduction here of a few pounds of refined sugar under that provision of the Dingley Act which imposed a duty equal to the export duty—we have imposed an additional tax on all sugar from Russia. Russia answers by retaliation and puts 30 per cent on all iron, all steel, and similar products of American production or manufacture. The disastrous effects of the Dingley Act upon our trade with foreign nations have begun to show themselves, and unless there be some change the foreign trade of American farmers and manufacturers and producers generally will be nullified, and the foreign markets, which have been so beneficial to American farmers and producers, will be closed.

What does the law of Germany provide to-day? And mark me, Germany, next to England, is the greatest purchaser of American goods. The law of Germany provides for reciprocity treaties—provides for reciprocal arrangements between Germany and other countries. If Germany enters into a reciprocal arrangement with Russia, and permits Russian wheat to come into Germany at lower rates than American wheat, it means that thousands and thousands of bushels of American wheat and American corn and American bacon, which heretofore have been sold in Germany, will find no market there, and the disastrous effects of the Dingley Act will be felt in reduced prices of farm products, in poverty of producing people in America, and in general distress among such classes.

Now, go further. Take France to-day and observe the effects of the Dingley Act in consequence of the refusal of the ratification of the treaty with France. To-day American goods and productions are paying in France a maximum rate. In that country they have what are known as a minimum rate and a maximum rate. American goods to-day in the great cities of France, the third market for United States goods in the world, on account of the exclusive rates of the Dingley Act, pay the highest rate of duty, while other goods pay the lowest rates, and in all the markets of France our goods and the products of our farms are discriminated against more than in any other nation in the world. We pay a 30 per cent preferential duty in Canada. We pay the highest duty, which is coming, in Germany. We pay the highest duty in France. Austria to-day has a bill pending in its legislative body providing for the highest duties on American produce, American commerce, and American goods.

I believe before this Congress is adjourned there will be preferential rates against us in Austria. The whole of Europe, which buys and consumes about three-fourths of our goods to-day, is combined in the interest of a commercial warfare against the United States, and these gentlemen can not ignore it. They may talk about standing pat. They may talk about standing on the rates of the Dingley Act, but as sure as you and I are here, in less than twelve months Europe and the world that buys American goods will have high tariff laws enacted, custom duties imposed, which will place upon American goods and American commerce and American farm products a discriminating duty in the markets of the world. Now, consequently, the tariff question becomes a potential and a far-reaching question to the American people. In addition to that, what has it done? Think. We have here a Republican committee and a Republican Congress reluctantly, slowly, and unwillingly retreating before the public opinion of this country in connection with coal.

What is the condition in connection with coal? The entire coal product of this country has been monopolized. One man, J. Pierpont Morgan, had the power to determine as to whether any coal should be mined in the United States and furnished to the shivering masses. There was a difference between him and his employees as to wages and as to the conditions under which they should work. He was determined to conquer the labor unions, and the labor unions were determined to conquer him. So for four or five months there was no coal produced. The great consuming public of 70,000,000 of people who buy coal and use coal, who need it in business, in trade, in commerce, and in their households, were not considered in this fight between the labor unions on the one side and J. Pierpont Morgan on the other. Consequently there was a dearth of coal. And what does the Republican party do to-day confronted with this monopoly, confronted with the fact that the railroads and J. Pierpont Morgan and the laborers could fix the price of coal?

Reluctantly they introduce here to-morrow a bill that takes the duty off coal for one year and allows it to come in free, admitting and confessing that monopoly has produced such a condition of affairs that the people of this country could not stand it longer, and that shivering humanity were entitled and ought to have the privilege to have coal from all the markets of the world. That confession in connection with coal should be carried to all the other industries of this country. Take the great industry of iron, protected and sheltered under this tariff bill. To-day the United States steel corporation controls the entire product of iron in the United States. They own nearly all the raw material from which iron ore can be obtained. They own nearly all the great coke products by which it can be utilized and made into iron. That company controls, through Mr. Morgan, all of the great transportation lines over which iron and iron ore and steel are shipped. They own all the great steel manufactories in this country in which steel billets can be made and produced.

If there were the same fight between the employees of the United States Steel Company and Mr. Morgan that there has been between the coal people and their employees, the entire product of iron in this country would be in the same condition that coal is. The farmers could not get plow points, contractors could not get nails, cities and towns could not get structural iron to build bridges, rail roads could not get steel rails for their development, people could not get iron with which to build houses, and the entire iron industry of this country, which is the barometer of prosperity, and by which the prosperity of this country is united and welded, would be in the same condition with the same disastrous effect which we have now in the coal industry of this country, and no relief could come until the tariff duties that produce this monopoly in iron were repealed. Take other great industries where monopoly has control. Take the great glass industry of the country, highly protected under the form of monopoly. Take the great industries in connection with all tinware. All of these great industries, under a protective tariff, are monopolized by trusts and combines, and we are dependent upon them for the supply entirely, under the tariff provisions of this bill.

And, Mr. Chairman, when relief is given in the coal industry, it seems to me we should at the same time take the precaution to guard against the same disasters in connection with the great iron industry of this country by taking the duty off of iron and all of its products controlled and dominated by one trust in this country. These gentlemen tell you that this tariff is needed to protect American industry. Why, the foreigners are crying for mercy against the American invasion. The foreigners in Germany, France, and Austria are crying for mercy and for a protective tariff against the invasion of American goods, produced here under a high protective tariff, and sold on the American market at double what they are sold for in foreign markets.

Take the great iron industry in this country, Mr. Chairman. Why, my friend General GROSVENOR over there has been trying for years to get through this Congress a bill to give a subsidy to the great shipbuilding interests of this country, saying that it needs a bounty and needs a gift from the American Government in order to enable it to stand up and compete with the shipbuilding interests of the world. And what do we witness? We find that the United States Steel Company is selling all of its steel products and all that goes into the manufacture of ships in foreign countries at a greatly reduced rate below what it sells to the shipbuilders of America. If you will eliminate the low price that is given for iron and steel products by the steel producers of America to the shipbuilders of England and Germany below what they charge the American shipbuilders on account of the high protective tariff in this country, the American shipbuilding interest would be able to compete successfully with the shipbuilding interests of the world.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SWANSON. I will.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is it not a fact that when the great Chicago fire and the great Boston fire occurred Congress removed the tariff on building materials so as to help the sufferers by those fires?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, why do they not remove it from coal?

Mr. SWANSON. They are going to remove it for one year. I tell you this coal provision is a confession on the part of the Republican party that the consumers pay the tax. It is a confession on the part of the Republican party, reluctantly yielding to an indignant American public, that the tariff provision on coal that gives 67 cents a ton protection on all coal is simply a gift to the coal operators—a gift to a trust. They have reluctantly retreated for one year in the face of an outraged American public.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say in connection with this tariff that one of the most fertile sources of trusts, combines, and monopolies is the protective tariff. The Republican party has this anomaly. It has appointed a committee to try to bring in here an antitrust bill to prevent the American public from being charged extortionate rates, monopolistic rates, for all the products that are consumed. And what do we witness? We witness the fact that there has been a doubling in value in wire nails, in wire fencing, in steel rails, in hilling hoes and plows, and all the great products of iron that enter the humblest home of the smallest farmer, and in the materials that are used in the construction of bridges. We find that magnificent buildings have doubled in value, and the entire doubling in value has gone into the pocket of one trust, the United States Steel Corporation, a trust whose annual budget, whose annual expenses and annual receipts amount to more than those of some of the nations of the earth; a trust that is made possible entirely by the protective tariff on all the products of iron, extending from iron ore up to the finished product. And they do what?

I have heard the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and other Republicans on that side denounce the people in Germany because they would pay about 7 cents a pound for sugar on account of the protective tariff, and sell it in Great Britain and here for 3 cents a pound. And yet they have a protective tariff on all the products of iron, and it is in proof here that can not be denied, it is confessed by Mr. John W. Gates, president of the old steel and wire company, and it is admitted by Mr. Schwab, president of the United States Steel Company, that their products of iron and steel are all sold abroad cheaper than at home. In other words, what does it mean to farmers of Iowa and Nebraska and Virginia? It means that when the farmers of those States have to compete with the farmers of Russia in the raising of wheat and other farm products, the farmers of Russia have about one-half as much to pay for all the products of iron that go to help in the making of their wheat as the farmers here have to pay. Yet we are expected to meet them in the markets of the world in the sale of our farm products.

What has been the result of this, Mr. Chairman? I want to tell you to-day, Mr. Chairman, that the Dingley Act would never have remained one year on the statute books except for the conduct of the railroads of this country. The railroads of this country to-day write your tariff bills, and not Congress. When the duties had been imposed so high on imported goods when practically there was no importation, what did the railroads of this country do? They established two rates on goods shipped over their lines. One was known as the rate on import goods and one was known as the rate on domestic goods. The Interstate Commerce Commission is to-day investigating this question.

I want to give you a practical illustration. The rates on plate glass and all earthenware are practically fixed by the trusts. The railroads of this country fixed the railroad rates under which they would ship goods from Dresden at, I believe, 19 cents per 100 pounds from New York to Chicago. They charge the home product 65 cents per 100 pounds. It is proven before the Industrial Commission that goods are shipped from Liverpool to New Orleans and out through Texas at about one-half the domestic trade over the Southern Pacific Railroad, and that the railroad charges less than half on the foreign goods than on domestic goods. The railroads of this country are thus able to write our tariff bill, and have kindly eliminated some of the duties and charges of the Dingley Act.

But, Mr. Chairman, these railroads have reduced the rates and they are carrying all foreign goods for less than domestic goods, but that reduction has been written by the greed and avarice and the desire to make money by the railroads and not for the great industrial interests or the manufacturing interests of this country. I say that it is an outrage on Congress, it is an outrage on the Government power of Congress, to allow the tariff laws of this country to be regulated by the greed, the avarice, and the selfishness of the railroads in fixing the rates, and not the change of the customs duties as they are fixed by Congress.

I want to say that the Dingley Act would not have stood on the statute books for one year but for the fact that these inequalities to some extent have been eliminated and importation encouraged by this discrimination on the part of the railroads of this country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is this issue that the American people will have to confront in the next Presidential and Congressional elections. The Republican party has tried to shirk it, to smother it, and to smooth it over. They are simply for it in State conventions. The Republican party in Iowa is for tariff reform when they are at home, but when their members of Congress come to this House and opportunity is given in the adoption of rules and the passing of provisions we will see whether they are going to vote for it or are simply for it by resolution in State conventions. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] has recognized the iniquities of the iron schedules. He has seen its injustice, he has seen that it is a monopoly, he has seen that it is a great incubus upon American production and American trade and American commerce, and he has had a bill pending here for years to eliminate and to reduce the exclusive duties in the act. If there were 25 Republicans on that side who earnestly and sincerely were in favor of it and united with the Democrats on this side, that relief and that benefit could be given to the American people, and that monopoly and that injustice and these exclusive rates eliminated.

But, Mr. Chairman, President Roosevelt in his mind is not determined as to what we shall do on the tariff question. He made several speeches on it. He was adroit; he was uncertain. The American people are not uncertain. A great rebellion, a great indignation, a great uprising in connection with coal is but a forerunner of the indignation that will come to the other iniquitous schedules of the Dingley bill. If Mr. Dingley had not intended, if he had not thought, if he had not known that the rates were too high and would produce monopoly, he never would have consented to reciprocity which would permit a 20 per cent reduction on all its schedules and provisions.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the Dingley tariff act has doubled the price of all the products people buy and consume and use in the household, in railroad building, in bridge building, in the structure of houses, in clothing, in wool, in shoes, and all the great products the American people consume and buy, on account of the high duties and extortionate rates they must pay for all they buy and consume in this country, most of the profits of which go to consolidations, to monopolies, to trusts and combines; and the American people in the next great Presidential election will be confronted with the question whether this shall continue—whether we shall lose the markets of the world, whether we shall be deprived of an equal price in Germany and France, in Canada, in Austria, in Russia, in the great markets of the world, that buy the products of our farm and factory—as to whether these exclusive duties shall be imposed upon the trade and commerce of America, or whether Americans shall be confined simply to traffic among ourselves, is the question which the American people will have to vote on in 1904.

If I mistake not the signs of the times; if I mistake not the indications in Iowa; if I mistake not the indications in New York; if I mistake not the indications in the great States of this country—the mass of people are determined on one thing, and that is that this bill shall be reformed; that its excessive duties, that its excessive rates, shall be cut down, and that the American consumer shall be given a chance, that the American farmer shall be given a chance, to get to the markets of the world.

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party's position is well taken on this question. The Democratic party believes that the American thrift, American commerce, American trade, and American enterprise can take care of the markets of the world. We have here the raw material, we believe we have the laborers, we believe we have the machinery, we believe we have the chance if we are unfettered and unrestrained by monopolies and unrestrained by excessive rates, when the Democratic party points to the trade and the agricultural products and the manufacturing enterprise of this country and tells them that with a fair chance, unfettered by any tariff law, we can have the markets of the world; that they are open to American enterprise and American labor and American thrift. The Republican party reluctantly, slowly, and unwillingly retreats before the common sense and good judgment and the common wish of the American people for lower duties.

Mr. Chairman, the next year will show a remarkable difference in American imports and American exports, all on account of the restricted duties. The balance of trade is getting worse and worse each year against us, and the next year will witness retaliatory laws all over the world, and when those laws of retaliation, like that they have enacted in Germany, in Russia, and in Canada, and those which are opposed against us in France to-day—when these become complete, when these are perfected, when the natural results of the Dingley law is felt in this country in lessening the exports, in lessening the American market in all parts of the world—we will then witness the great revival of tariff reform upon which the American people are determined.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SWANSON. I will if I have time.

Mr. HEPBURN. You have said that the balance of trade in later years was constantly growing less and less in our favor. Is it not true that the balance of trade last year in our favor was greater by hundreds of millions of dollars than during all of the years that this country has had a Democratic tariff—seventy-odd years?

Mr. SWANSON. The gentleman is correct, but we have 80,000,000 people now, while heretofore we did not have but 60,000,000. Any increase of population under natural conditions ought to have a natural increase of exportation, and the balance of trade, if these people are active and earnest, ought to increase each year. But what I say is that the agricultural products, the products of trade, are becoming more and more against us, and will be greater in the next year, with the determination of Germany to retaliate; and is simply a question of time when these laws of retaliation, like those that are put in the Dingley Act, are enacted, when the export trade of this country will become very materially reduced.

The gentleman must remember this. Does the gentleman think that a double tariff on bacon, that a double tariff on wheat, that a double tariff on flour, that a double tariff on corn in Germany can benefit the farmers of Iowa? That is what has been the result of the Dingley Act in connection with the trade with Germany, for the farmers of that country found their second best market in the world. [Applause.]

Omnibus Building Bill.

OF

HON. DAVID H. MERCER,

OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 28, 1903.

The House having under consideration a motion to suspend the rules and pass with the amendments of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds the bill (S. 7414) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes—

Mr. MERCER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Judging from the outpouring enthusiasm we have just observed in this Chamber in favor of the pending proposition, it is perhaps unnecessary to dwell very long upon the subject. Apparently most of the members, having read the report, are informed with reference to the proposed legislation.

In brief, the principal part of this bill refers to increases of authorizations, made necessary by the increased price of building material in different parts of the country, and also the increased wages paid labor throughout the Republic. The Government finds, as private individuals and corporations find, that building material has increased in value, and the Government is obliged to pay an increased price for labor, corresponding with that paid by individuals and corporations employing labor on similar work. Almost half—in fact, more than half—of this increase is confined to very large buildings; for instance, like the one in Chicago.

Chicago is the largest city in the United States, save one. In proportion to its population it has received less at the hands of the Government in public-building appropriations than any other city, strange to say. Chicago is now completing a building which will have more cubic feet in it than any building in the United States save the State, War, and Navy building in the city of Washington. It will cost, with this increase granted, 41 cents per cubic foot, which is from 15 to 25 cents per cubic foot less than many Government public buildings have been erected for. It will house all the Government employees of that city save those in the appraiser's stores building, one or two other buildings; and, by the way, the appraiser's stores building in Chicago cost the Government a little over $130,000, by reason of the fact that the Government was able to sell a valuable piece of real estate there and have the money derived therefrom included in a new building.

The post-office building in Chicago is constructed upon the old site, and when completed will be perhaps the most complete General Government building in the United States, both as to interior arrangement, as to arrangement for convenience, and as to ventilation and light.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MERCER. In the city of New York we allowed $4,500,000 for the new custom-house which is in process of erection, and the building in Chicago, when completed, will cost $4,790,000.

We have the custom-house in San Francisco built upon ground owned by the United States Government. That is increased half a million. The municipal building in this city is increased half a million.

Many of the items are small. The Treasury Department informed our committee that because of the fact that Congress in preceding sessions had permitted the purchase of sites in advance of authorizing buildings thereby the Government had been saved thousands of dollars because of the increased price of real estate in the various cities occurring after the authorizations were made.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MERCER. Certainly, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman state the amount that is carried by this bill?

Mr. MERCER. About $6,000,000 in authorizations.

* * * * * * *

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] desires some of my time he may have it.

* * * * * * *

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has six minutes and a half.

Mr. MERCER. I desire to say in conclusion that while the last days of the Fifty-seventh Congress are stormy ones from a parliamentary standpoint and the two great parties, through their representatives upon this floor, are contending every hour for party advantage, very little if any disturbance of a serious nature crops out of individuals, and when noon of March 4 arrives this Congress will die, as Congresses generally die, in the midst of song and good cheer, and we will depart for our several homes never to forget the friendships formed here. Now and then we have our war of words in this Chamber, sarcasm and wit versus humor and ridicule, but the affray is only of the moment, as it ends when the last word is spoken.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] opposes the increase for the Government building at Chicago which your committee recommends. He is honest in his contention, but mistaken in judgment. We were asked to grant an increase of $1,000,000 for the Chicago building, but upon investigation we cut the estimates $210,000, making the total authorization $4.790,000, which amount will complete the building in first-class style. Chicago, however, is not the only city affected by this measure. The remedial legislation alone runs to almost one-half the States in the Union, and there are several new propositions that are full of merit, while the city of Washington is given an enlarged building for the accommodation of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, an urgent necessity, and sites for a hall of records and mail-bag repair shop—most urgent, both of them—are authorized by this bill. Other cities are demanding relief from Congress, but it is impossible to keep up with the growth of the country, and unless our wonderful developement is checked I fear that Congress will never be fully abreast of the times in public-building legislation. That, however, is a matter to be managed by a future Congress.

I ask for a vote.

Salaries of Certain Judges of the United States.

OF

HON. JOHN W. GAINES,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 27, 1903.

The House having under consideration the bill (S. 3287) to fix the salaries of certain judges of the United States—

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee said:

Mr. SPEAKER: There are several members of the Supreme Court and of these inferior Federal courts for whom I bear the profoundest respect and kindliest personal feeling. Their good citizenship and superb work as judges prompts me to praise them in the highest terms, and I know that should this measure become law it would accommodate them, as they think, very much. But I can not see my way clear to support it. I have thought seriously and conscientiously over the whole matter, with the hope that I could prompt myself into supporting this bill, but as it is national and not local, I can not in any wise allow my friendship to weigh in the least in solving the question. I must be just before I am generous even in private matters.

Let us for a few moments briefly look into this problem. The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court receives $10,500 and his eight associates $10,000 each, making an annual total of $90,500, with all their official expenses paid by the Government.

The judges of the United States circuit court of appeals receive, I believe, $6,000 each annually and their expenses, and there are three of this class in the District of Columbia.

The three judges of the court of appeals for the District of Columbia are paid $6,000 each, except the chief justice, who receives $6,500, with all official expenses paid.

The five supreme court judges for the District of Columbia are paid $5,000 each and all official expenses, I presume.

The five judges of the Court of Claims receive each $4,500 and official expenses, I assume.

You see plainly a great difference between the salaries of these several judges, running all the way from a minimum of $4,500 to $10,500 a year. All these judges who live here in the District of Columbia, in the city of Washington, and all buy their provisions in the same market, and rent or purchase and maintain their homes in the same locality, yet they do so on salaries ranging from $4,500 to $10,500, and yet no one has been heard to say that the judge who receives the smallest salary is any deeper in debt, if in debt at all, than the judge who receives $10,000 or $10,500, or that the judge who receives the largest salary lives any better or has more or does more work than the one who receives the least salary. This eliminates the question, "Shall we give these judges a living salary?" We also know that the judges who live in the States and Territories can live cheaper than those who live in Washington City.

When a vacancy occurs in any one of these courts there is a great scramble among the lawyers and their friends for the position. They are glad to get it. They hold to it not so much for the salary that is in it, but for the great honor, distinction, and social position these judgeships carry with them. But few, if any, resign. They ask for these positions, well knowing the amount of the salary is stipulated and fixed by law, and that they must do so much work. If they were to ask for these positions, conditioned that their salaries should be raised after appointment, I dare say that the President would refuse to appoint them, and why? Because there are many other lawyers just as capable as they who are perfectly willing, because of the great honor of these positions, to accept them with the present salaries attached.

Is it just to the people of this Republic, to the taxpayers, under such circumstances to raise the salaries of these officers? I think not.

Again, gentlemen, you well know there are thousands of just claims this Government owes—ten, twenty, forty, and fifty years old—Congress has not paid and wrongfully refuses to pay. Think of this wrong before you are generous.

I have already shown that you discriminate, and have always discriminated, between the salaries paid to judges of the Supreme Court and of the local inferior Federal courts, and you do not now say that the judges of the latter court should be paid equal to the judges of the former court, albeit they must purchase in the same market their maintenance. This clearly is one of the reasons the friends of this bill give for increasing these salaries. Yet in the same bill the same invidious distinction in the value of the salaries allowed is perpetuated, as now provided by law. So this reason for an increase falls to the ground.

All these judges find time for, and should have, their vacation, and regularly. After a good rest they can do better and more work. This we all know. But I am informed that the judges of the Court of Claims work nearly all the year round, and yet they receive less salary than the superior judges, who take a good vacation.

The circuit court of appeals was created, I believe, in 1891 or 1893. The report of the Attorney-General of the United States, dated November 29, 1902, page 1, shows that "the cases disposed of at the October term of 1890 by the Supreme Court was 610; in 1901, 375;" that the "total number of cases docketed" at this term was 623—that is, in 1890—and in 1901, 383—clearly less work to do and less done.

It seems to me the Supreme Court of the United States has less work to do since we created this circuit court of appeals than before, but are disposing of a fewer number of cases, and that, too, with a full court. The Attorney-General of the United States says:

REPORT OF THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., November 29, 1902.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

I have the honor to submit the following report of business transacted by the Department of Justice for the last preceding fiscal year and of other matters appertaining thereto, as required by law:

SUPREME COURT.

The accompanying table shows the result of last year's work of the Supreme Court of the United States, so far as the number of cases can show it. There was a decrease of 18 in the number of cases docketed on the appellate docket, and an increase of 7 in the number disposed of, the number remaining having been increased thereby from 336 to 344.

	Appellate docket—October term.
	1890.	1891.	1892.	1893.	1894.	1895.	1896.	1897.	1898.	1899.	1900.	1901.

You dare not say, gentlemen, that if you pay these judges larger salaries they will do more work. You dare not reflect upon them in any such manner. Those whom I personally know are men of honor, and they would repudiate instantly such an imputation. Again, gentlemen, these judges are appointed for life, and after they serve ten years and are 70 years of age they can retire on full pay, and I am informed one of the richest members of the Supreme Court of the United States will retire soon after this bill becomes a law.

Thus allowing these judges to retire—that is, on full pay, after ten years of service, and at the age of 70—is an invidious distinction shown this class of our public servants not shown to any other class.

This is a great consideration to which applicants look when they ask to be appointed to any one of these Federal judgeships. This you will not deny. I have heard this said, gentlemen, by members of this House: "I would give up a practice, if I had it, of $50,000 a year, for an appointment to the Supreme Court of the United States." If you please, an honest and patriotic ambition. I heard one of the judges of the supreme court of Tennessee say the reason why he sought a position in that great court—which has furnished two Supreme Judges of the United States, Justices Catron and Jackson—was "because of the honor the office bestows; to gratify an ambition I have to be a member of the Supreme Court." He was a poor man then and is now; a brilliant advocate and judge.

These, gentlemen, are some of the reasons why I can not support this measure.

I shall now come down to the question of the deportment of some of the judges in the District of Columbia, whose names I do not know, who (through their friends, I dare say) are asking that their salaries be increased.

I was appointed, without any solicitation whatever or knowledge of the fact until I was informed by letter, by Mayor Head, of Nashville, to represent him at what is known to you all as the "get-coal convention," a body of men who convened in Washington City this morning from all over the country, for the purpose of improvising some means to relieve the suffering in this city and the Atlantic coast caused by the coal famine. I was informed in open convention by one of the leading delegates of that convention who lives in this city that not a single solitary indictment had been found against these coal cormorants of the District of Columbia; that not a single grand jury had been charged to take this matter into consideration—this coal trust—and this, too, in the midst of horrible suffering of the people, well known right here in the shadow of the Capitol and the White House, in a stone's throw of the Attorney-General of the United States and under the very nose of these judges.

Is it possible this can be true? I am informed, as the proceedings of this convention will show, that it is true, and yet these judges, whose duty it is to charge the grand juries, and certainly so in a great crisis like this, to promptly and vigorously investigate this heartless holding up of the people—these judges now ask Congress to increase their salaries, put a premium upon such official deportment. If I am incorrectly informed, I pause to be corrected by any member of this House. [A pause.]

We see from the press that in Chicago a number of indictments against these coal barons and transportation lines have been found by the State courts. I ask, gentlemen, have we any law here covering such cases? Surely we must have, and if I am in error, correct me, geutlemen. In Nashville, Tenn., my home, the price of coal has not changed, and it is now selling from $3.25 to $3.75 per ton. But the point is, during this cold snap the price of coal has not risen there. Why is this? Demands have been made, or rather requests from the East for coal have been made on the coal dealers in Tennessee and Alabama, yet coal has not risen in price. Why is this? I will tell you. Mr. Speaker, the grand jury of the State courts of Tennessee are regularly charged to investigate any disobedience of our antitrust laws by any person or corporation, whether dealing in coal or any other product.

I inquired before I left home, along in November last, of Judge Hart, who presides over our criminal court at Nashville, and he said to me that he regularly charged his grand jury on the subject of our trust laws. And I want to say that several trusts have been crushed under the administration of this court. We believe in the freedom of State commerce and interstate commerce. We demand this personal right.

It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that the very first case filed under the antitrust act of June, 1890, was filed in the Federal court at Nashville, and although Judge Hammond—a Republican, I may add—refused a temporary injunction, in a few months proof was taken, and Judge David M. Key, an old ex-Confederate soldier and our regular district Federal judge, heard the case and perpetually enjoined and broke up a coal combine entered into between citizens at Nashville and in Kentucky.

The opinion of Judge Key can be found reported, I think, in 46 Federal Reporter; and is known as the Jellico case, and I may add here with great pleasure that the United States district attorney in the case was an able lawyer and an ex-Federal soldier, Col. John Ruhm. By prompt and vigorous action this law crushed this coal combine and gave our people relief. The noted Addyston pipe trust case arose in Chattanooga, Tenn. Proceedings were filed under the Cleveland Administration, and the late James H. Bible, a Democrat, was the United States district attorney in charge, acting under the orders of Attorney-General Harmen, Democrat, and not the lamented Garland, as I heretofore stated. The injunction in this case was at first refused, but this judgment was reversed by the circuit court of appeals, composed of Justices Taft of Ohio, Lurton of Tennessee, and Severens of Michigan; and the Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of the circuit court, and this combine was crushed. Indictments were found against the interested parties. They were found guilty and fined each $5,000, as the press reports of that date stated. So much for the way the law is enforced against trusts in Tennessee. Why should the same law and the common law of this district sleep while the people suffer? But such is the case.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to deal fairly with my fellowman, whether friend or foe, in all cases, and I have thus spoken because my heart is in this subject and I hear the appeal of the people on the outside of this great body, and if I should say less on this occasion, under these circumstances, my conscience would lash me and I would fall short of doing my full duty. I can not yield, and will not, to my friendship and kindly feeling for members of these great courts and do what I think is placing a premium on derelict officials.

I love to be generous and unselfish, and often my oath guards me from doing things that appear to be merciful and generous, but which in law under that oath would be wrong to do, and I stand by my oath. The law was made to protect the people of this district and this Republic from the wrongs of which I here complain, brought to my attention by the suffering people, and I must believe the statements that I have here recited about these judges are true. I have asked you to correct me if I am in error, and you remain mute, while your neighbors say this is all true.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Very well.

Mr. BABCOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if the judges in the District of Columbia are charged with the duty of prosecution? In other words, are they prosecuting officers?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They are not prosecuting attorneys, of course not; but it is their duty under the law, as I am informed, to charge the grand juries and certainly to enforce the law, and thus themselves to obey the law, and this I am informed publicly they have not done.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] is chairman of the District of Columbia Committee. He should know the law. And if there is no law, the gentleman has not at any time, this session or for the past six years, opened his mouth on the subject.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.
